DEDICATION.

This work is dedicated to the surviving members of the 56th Regiment, New York Veteran Volunteers and their immediate relatives. It is fondly hoped that it will prove to be of great interest and a source of enjoyment to them. It required much research and labor to acquire all the data, and while a small portion is made from memory, all the material portion has been compiled from official records and memoranda made at the time of occurrence or directly thereafter, and is undoubtedly correct. Acknowledgment is with pleasure made of courtesies extended and valuable assistance rendered by Capt. James Gowdy, Capt. James J. Cox, Col. R. Tyler, Rev. Jesse F. Shafer, and others in the compilation of this work; without their kind assistance it would be still more incomplete. The authors have condensed the history as much as it seemed possible, confining it to the immediate service of the regiment as a unit, without mentioning individuals, unless seemingly unavoidable, except in the Roster. Details of minor importance, which would not apply to the regiment as a whole, but which will readily occur to the mind and memory of the members of the regiment as the main events are brought to their recollection in the perusal of the history of their service in the regiment, are omitted, as otherwise the work would be of enormous proportions.

We acknowledge with thanks the kindness of L. S. & J. D. Stivers, of Middletown, N. Y., in furnishing the photograph of General C. H. Van Wyck, which appears in this volume.

RALLYING SONG

OF THE

TENTH LEGION, N. Y. S. V.

BY A. D. DUBOIS.

Air—"Old Empire State," as sung by the Hutchinson Family.

I.
We have come from the mountains,
We have come from the mountains,
We have come from the mountains
Of the old Empire State,
With the Stars and Stripes above us,
And the prayers of those who love us,
Every single soldier of us
Is prepared for any fate.

II.
We have left our cheerful quarters
By the Hudson’s smiling waters,
And our wives and sons and daughters,
For the fierce and bloody fight.
But they need not deplore us,
With the foe encamped before us,
For the God who watches o’er us
Will himself protect the right.

III.
From the Delaware we rally,
From the Mamakating Valley,
And to combat forth we sally
When our bleeding country calls—
From the Shawangunk Mountains hoary,
And the Minisink, whose story
Tells what recompense of glory
Waits the soldier when he falls.
IV.
From Old Sullivan we muster—
She is loyal, we can trust her—
And from Orange and from Ulster,
   And from bright Cochecton’s banks,
And there’s plenty in those regions
For a dozen more such Legions.
All as sturdy as Norwegians,
   And prepared to fill the ranks.

V.
Then whene’er our Country needs us
And where’er our banner leads us,
Never heeding what impedes us,
   We will follow to the death:
For the patriot must not falter,
When his Country’s foes assault her,
And profane her sacred altar
   With their pestilential breath.

VI.
May our flag float on forever
O’er a Union none can sever,
And may vile Secession never Spread its ruin through our land:
May our Country’s wrongs be righted,
And her children reunited,
And her flag no more be blighted
   By the touch of treason’s hand.

CHAPTER I.
Organization of the Tenth Legion by Charles H. Van Wyck, Congressman—His Appointment and Commission as Colonel—Camp Van Wyck—Life in Camp—Captain A. Van Horne Ellis the Regimental Instructor—Health of Men Fairly Good.

The Tenth Legion was organized by Charles H. Van Wyck in July, 1861, he being at that time the Congressman of the 10th Congressional District of the State of New York, with headquarters at Newburgh, N. Y., and consisted of 10 companies of infantry, one company of sharp shooters, 2 companies of artillery, and 2 companies of cavalry. A camp of rendezvous and instruction was established on the sandy plateau near New Windsor, on the west bank of the Hudson River, until November 6, 1861, when the Legion was taken to Washington, D. C., where the military authorities detached the artillery and cavalry companies, placing the artillery companies in the artillery division, and the cavalry companies with the cavalry corps. The sharpshooters' company was designated Co. L, attached to and formed a part of the infantry regiment, then consisting of eleven companies and designated the 56th Regiment, New York Volunteer Infantry, and attached to and formed a part of the Provisional Brigade, commanded by W. H. H. Davis, Colonel of the 104th Penna. regiment. The brigade consisted of the 11th Maine, 56th New York, 100th New York, 52d and 104th Pennsylvania regiments. The regiment thus lost its identity as a part of the Tenth Legion, which name was never known or recognized by the War Department, although among the officers and members and their relatives and friends it was always considered and called the 10th Legion regiment, and the large white "X" was worn on the uniform coat, until the coats were worn out, and on the knapsacks throughout the war.

Charles H. VanWyck was appointed and commissioned colonel of the regiment, and commanded it until he was brevetted Brigadier-General, serving as such during the reconstruction period after the cessation of hostilities, and even during that time he was in close proximity to the regiment and kept close watch and strict supervision over his boys, as he was wont to call them, and was mustered out with them at Charleston and accompanied them home.

The first company organized was Company A, which was raised in the Village of Newburgh, Thomas S. Marvel acting as recruiting officer, who was elected and commissioned captain of that company. The members of the company consisted almost entirely of the young men of that village, and went into camp at New Windsor in July, 1861. Company A was there joined by the other companies in regular order as fast as formed. Charles F. Thayer recruited Company B, also at the Village of Newburgh, and was elected and commissioned its captain, and that was the second company to go into camp in the month of July, 1861. Company C was recruited at Montgomery, Orange County, N. Y., by Frederick Decker, who was elected captain and commissioned as such, and with his company joined the other companies in camp in August, 1861.

John J. Wheeler recruited company D at Warwick, Orange County, N. Y., was elected and commissioned as its captain and joined the other three companies in camp in August, 1861. Company E was recruited by William J. Williams at Newburgh, who was duly elected and commissioned captain of that company, which went into camp with the other companies in September, 1861. Company F was recruited by Melvin S. Wells, at Liberty, Sullivan County, N. Y., who was elected and commissioned its captain, and went into camp with his company, with the other companies, in September, 1861. Company G was recruited by William D. Fuller, at Ellenville, Ulster County, N. Y., who was elected and commissioned captain, and with the company joined the other companies in camp in October, 1861. Company H was recruited by William K. Joscelyn, at Callicoon, Sullivan County, N. Y. He was elected and commissioned captain of that company, which went into camp with the other companies in October, 1861. Company I was recruited by John Ernhout, in the town of Fallsburgh, Sullivan County, N. Y. He was elected and commissioned captain of that company, which went into camp with the other companies in October, 1861. Company K was recruited by Asa Hodge, at Neversink, Sullivan County, N. Y., and he was elected and commissioned its captain, and with the company joined the other companies in camp in October, 1861. Company L, or the sharpshooters company, was recruited by Rockwell Tyler, from the whole of Sullivan County, N. Y., with headquarters at Cochecton. The members were selected for their superior marksman-ship, all being experienced hunters and woodsmen and experts with the rifle. Tyler was elected and commissioned captain of the company, he being himself an expert marksman, and with the company joined the regiment in camp in the latter part of October, 1861, shortly before the regiment left for Washington.

The camp was situated on a dry, sandy plateau, particularly well adapted for and was an ideal camp ground, with a slight incline, providing excellent facilities for drainage, considerably elevated, well provided with excellent water and furnishing an extensive parade and drill ground, and was called Camp Van Wyck, in honor of our esteemed colonel.

Each company was provided with "A" tents sufficient in number to accommodate the members, with straw to cover the ground inside, which we slept upon wrapped in woolen blankets, and made quite comfortable sleeping accommodations when the weather was dry and pleasant. But the wind had an uncomfortable habit of overturning the tents, especially in a hard shower, and wetting our beds, and the water of running under the tents and flooding us out. Uniforms were furnished to all of the members with the letter "X" on the left breast, embroidered in white on the coat, of which we were very proud, and nearly every one had his picture taken and sent home to his parents or family.

The members of the regiment were fed, or boarded, by Benjamin B. Odell and John Blizard, of Newburgh, who had the contract to furnish meals for the organization. Each company had a separate table, and at meal time were formed and marched by twos, in command of an officer, to the pavilion, each rank occupying opposite sides of the table, seated on long wooden benches, and were provided with abundance of good, substantial food, and we used to have some good, high old times at meals, laughing, joking, and expressing our feeling in various ways hilarious and otherwise, which was done as is supposed to assist digestion.

Captain A. Van Horne Ellis, an officer who served in the 71st Regiment, New York State Militia, in the battle of Bull Run, Va., July 21, 1861, then residing in the near vicinity of the camp, was detailed as instructing officer. He daily gave the officers instructions, and practiced them in the several movements of the company and regiment. He also drilled the regiment, and supervised the officers in drilling the men by companies as well as in the regimental movements; and the officers and men rapidly became proficient in all the movements, after which we were furnished Belgian muskets, with which we practiced and were taught the manual of arms.

Shortly before leaving Camp Van Wyck, we were furnished short Enfield rifles with sword bayonets, were thoroughly drilled and instructed in their use, including skirmish drill and in street firing while marching through the streets of a city, and fighting and repelling attacks from a mob, as the regiment was expected to march through the streets of the city of Baltimore, where an attack was possible, as the 6th Massachusetts regiment was attacked a few months before, and we were thoroughly prepared and willing, even anxious for them to try the experiment on us.

The health of the men was fairly good during the time the regiment was encamped at New Windsor, but few cases of sickness, and those not serious, furnishing but little work for the surgeons. At the examination of the men for muster, quite a large number were found not to be up to the standard of physical ability fixed by military authority of the War Department, and were rejected and discharged for disability; quite a large number, not liking military life as experienced, deserted, a few on the same day they were mustered in, before we left Newburgh.

Colonel Ellis, having instructed and drilled the men and officers and thoroughly taught them the duties of soldiers and all the routine of military business, and brought the regiment to a high state of discipline and efficiency, was proud of his achievement, as well as of the officers and men and of the regiment as an organization, and very much desired to command it as its colonel, and used all his best endeavors and influence to that end. But Col. Van Wyck, however, would not consent, and his influence, coupled with the fact that he had recruited the regiment, enabled him to retain the command of the boys he so much loved, and assured them that he would not desert them, but would look after them during their term of service according to his promise to their parents, families and friends; and Col. Ellis, much to his regret, was obliged to sever his connection with the regiment.
CHAPTER II.

Departure from Camp Van Wyck—Arrival in New York City—Beautiful Banner Presented to the Regiment by “The Sons of Orange and Sullivan”—It was Carried All Through The War—The Trip to Washington—Hazardous March Through Baltimore—In Camp at Kalorama Heights—Camp on the Banks of Rock Creek—Carver Barracks Described—A Famous Dog.

On the 6th day of November, 1861, the regiment, numbering 1,130, officers and men, marched proudly away from Camp Van Wyck, in their bright new uniforms, with full packed knapsacks on their backs, cartridge box, haversacks and canteens, new Enfield rifles, with bright steel sabre bayonets, amid the plaudits, cheers and goods wishes of thousands of the citizens of the village of Newburgh, and the parents and friends of many of the boys from the country around, and went aboard the steamers which were at Mailler’s dock, at the foot of Third Street, to convey the regiment to New York City. On arrival at that place, Thursday, November 7th, 1861, the regiment disembarked and marched to Union Square, where it was presented with a beautiful white silk banner by Gen. Stuart L. Woodford, who delivered an eloquent, patriotic speech at its presentation in behalf of the patriotic society known as “The Sons of Orange and Sullivan,” of which Col. Van Wyck was a member. The banner was carried all through the war and at the close thereof was, with the other flags of the regiment, deposited in Washington’s Headquarters at Newburgh. After the presentation the regiment marched down Broadway, which was lined with thousands of people, who cheered and shouted themselves hoarse, and complimented the boys on their good appearance and perfect marching. While marching through Broadway one of the members of Company A picked up a small spotted puppy, which had strayed into the street, and carried it along to Washington, named it Jack, and it remained with the regiment during its entire service, became a special favorite with every member, was in every skirmish and battle, was wounded in the hip at the battle of Fair Oaks, while sitting on the battle line howling, which was the only time he was touched by balls or shot, and survived all the vicissitudes of camp, bivouac and battle field and returned with the regiment and died of old age.

We crossed the Hudson River on a ferryboat to Jersey City, where we boarded the cars and started for Washington. Arriving at the city of Philadelphia, we were furnished with a good, substantial meal, in a large hall, by the benevolent ladies of the Quaker City, who furnished the same to all the troops passing through that city on their way to the National Capital. On our arrival at the city of Baltimore we were obliged to march across the city on the same streets in which the 6th Massachusetts regiment had been mobbed with such sad and disastrous results. We disembarked from the cars at the depot, formed in column, loaded our rifles, fixed the sabre bayonets, received instructions and caution, and in formation for streetiring, marched proudly through the city, in momentary expectation of being attacked, as the sidewalks were thronged with people, and the windows and doorways packed and sidewalks filled with gaping crowds. The officers directed the men to sing our regimental song, "We have come from the mountains of the old Empire State," probably to direct our thoughts and keep our courage up to the proper point. The men all joined in the song and made the welkin ring with the great volume of a chorus of 1,100 voices, much to the amazement of the multitude. The spectacle of 1,100 stalwart men and boys, each carrying a rifle and gleaming fixed bayonet, with firm tread, determined mien, proud bearing, evidently ready for trouble and willing to meet it, seemed to have a cowering effect, as not a sound was made or word spoken by the spectators during the entire passage of the regiment through the city, save from one old, long-haired native, who, at the end of the refrain "We have come from the mountains," exclaimed, "Any — fool would know that."

Arriving at the depot on the outskirts of the city, we again boarded the cars and sped away, being then in a hostile country. Arriving at Havre de Grasse, where the river or bay was some three miles wide, the train of cars was divided in half; one half was run onto one side of a large steam float, the other half was pushed on the other side, the locomotive left behind and we were transported across the water to the landing on the other shore, where the cars were run off the boat onto tracks, the two sections joined together, and with another engine, we proceeded on our way to Washington. On arriving at that city the regiment was marched to a large brick warehouse where we spread our blankets on the brick floor and slept as well as we could, free from the terrible anxiety we experienced during our journey, having been in constant danger of attack by the enemy the entire distance from Baltimore to Washington. The next day the regiment, with the exception of Company L, marched to Kalorama Heights, a short distance northerly from Georgetown, where we went into camp in tents, and remained there about two weeks. The weather was quite cold and bleak, the wind had a fair sweep over the heights, and as we had only tents and were obliged to sleep on the cold ground with no straw or anything for bedding but our blankets, with little wood for fires, and no stoves, there was much suffering. Many caught severe colds, which in many cases resulted in pneumonia; others contracted rheumatism, some were attacked with lung trouble, which resulted in consumption, of which many ultimately died. Many of the men were here disabled from the ills contracted from the exposure in the camp, and were discharged from the hospitals during that winter, and quite a number died and a few were buried there and some were sent home for burial.

In the latter part of November we went into camp on the banks of Rock Creek, a small stream of water in the northern suburbs of Georgetown, in a deep gulch, in a fine grove of large trees; where the camp was well protected from the cold winds, and where we had plenty of pure, running spring water for all purposes. Here the usual camp duties were performed, company drills each day, camp guard, policing and occasionally picket duty, living in the "A" tents and sleeping on the ground as before, until the 4th day of January, 1862, when the regiment marched to Meridian Hill and into Carver Barracks, which were large, long, wooden buildings in numbers sufficient to accommodate our entire brigade. These barracks had been built by details of men from the several regiments of the brigade. The buildings were situated on four sides of a large square, each regiment occupying the buildings on the side of the square to which it was assigned. Each barrack or building was a long, narrow structure with the end toward the square or parade ground, and parallel to each other. The commissioned officers of each company had a room in the end of the building assigned to their company and there was a building for each and every company. The room had sleeping accommodations for the officers, bunks or berths being built on one side, with a stove for burning wood, making quite comfortable quarters. The non-commissioned officers' room was in the other end of the building and was furnished the same as the officers' room: and the intervening long room was occupied by the men, with the same furnishings, bunks or berths built one above the other from the floor up in tiers on one side and two ends. There were stoves, with plenty of good wood. Each company had its own cook and assistant cook detailed from the ranks, who cooked the rations issued, and at meal time formed in line, marched to the cook house, each man with a tin plate and a tin cup for coffee or tea. Each in his turn received his cooked portion of that meal and his cup of coffee or tea, returned to his quarters, ate his meal and then washed his dishes and put them away until the next meal. On our side of the square there were 18 barracks, one for each of the 11 companies, one for the field and staff officers, two for the artillery and two for the cavalry companies, one guard house, and one for the "non com." staff and musicians. The regimental post office was in a room in one end of the field and staff barrack, with A. J. Clem- ments as postmaster, who was supposed to obtain Col. Van Wyck's frank "M. C." on each letter sent home by the boys, thus saving them postage.

The duties were light, consisting of guard and police duty, but the men were compelled to drill each pleasant day, at squad, company, regimental and brigade drill, and in the manual of arms, in which we became so proficient that the whole regiment could go through them in perfect unison, and correctly without orders, simply by the tap of the big drum.

The officers and non-commissioned officers diligently studied Casey's Tactics, which had been adopted by the military authorities in the place of Scott's, in order to enable them to pass the examination for the several positions successfully, which the greater number of them did succeed in retaining, but few of the commissioned officers being rejected and discharged, ostensibly for disability. The officers and men were all so enthusiastic, earnest and diligent in practice that it was conceded that the regiment was one of the best drilled regiments in the army, thanks to Col. Jordan, and the brigade the best drilled in the army, especially in the manual of arms.

Dress parade as performed by our brigade was not excelled by any similar body of troops in Washington. Large crowds of citizens and military officers and navy officers, the President and family and General Scott and daughter often attended to witness the grand and imposing spectacle. The performance of the mountain boys in the several company and regimental maneuvers and the extraordi-ary precision and unison with which the many motions in the manual or arms were made, was so machine-like as to indicate that all the muskets were controlled by one lever. The regimental band, too, was quite an attraction as it played during dress parade, while marching back and forth along the front of the line. It consisted of 15 pieces and rendered excellent music and made a fine appearance on parade, as did the members of the regiment in their new uniforms of blue with the large “X” in white embroidered on the left breast of the coat, which with the Enfield rifle, shining sabre bayonet and all equipment bright and new, was indeed an inspiring spectacle.

The health of the men while in the barracks was fairly good,
there being but few cases of illness other than measles and smallpox.
The greatest number of cases reported was from typhoid fever, from which several died and were buried in the cemetery at the Soldiers’ Home.

One of the greatest and most notable events that probably ever occurred within the bounds of the District of Columbia, other than the Grand Review after the close of the war, was the grand review of the army organized by General McClellan, which review and parade took place in the latter part of March, 1862, just previous to the removal of the army to the Peninsula. The army was reviewed by President Lincoln and General Scott, who were accompanied by the Cabinet, and which was witnessed by thousands of the citizens of Washington. There were upwards of 140,000 troops of infantry, cavalry and artillery, occupying all day in passing the reviewing stand, marching in close column, by regimental platoons, 250 files abreast.
Immediately after the review preparations were begun for active operations at the front. The members of the regiment were all examined by the surgeons, those unfitted for long marches and active service in the coming campaign being either sent to hospital or discharged. The cornet band belonging to the regiment had been mustr-ered out March 1, 1862. Clothing of all kinds was issued, ammunition furnished and the command made ready for active service in the field.

On the suggestion of and at the invitation of the President the regiment marched to the White House, passed through the rooms and shook hands with him, who had a pleasant word for every man. We then marched to the Smithsonian Institute, visited all the rooms, thence to the Capitol, and went through all the public halls and rooms, and had a delightful time sight-seeing during the entire day. It was a novel and delightful experience, one never to be forgotten, and furnished a theme for conversation among the boys for many a day. Shortly before leaving Washington we exchanged our Enfields for new American-made Springfield, muzzle-loading rifles, calibre 58-100, with angular bayonets.
CHAPTER III.

March through Washington—Trip down the Potomac—First Experience under Fire—Arrival at Newport News—Camp in front of Yorktown—First Battle Engaged in by the Regiment—Battle of Williamsburgh—Naglee’s Brigade—Bottoms Bridge—White Oak Swamp Creek—Carter’s Hill—Visited by President Lincoln—Hooker’s Advance on Malvern Hill—First to Cross the Chickahominy.

On the 29th day of March, 1862, Casey’s Division, consisting of four brigades, in all 14 regiments, led by the Marine Band of the City of Washington, marched through the streets of that city to and across the Long Bridge over the Potomac River on to the sacred soil of Virginia, and down and along that river 8 miles to the city of Alexandria, called the “Finished City,” and through the city to a large open field, where we went into bivouac through the night, sleeping in the open air, on the ground, with no cover other than our blankets. During the night snow fell to the depth of four inches or more, covering all of us, and in the morning the field had the appearance of a snow-covered cemetery, full of newly-made mounds, with no monuments or head stones.

The large number of troops marching and countermarching, with baggage wagons, soon mixed the melting snow with the soil in the field and the dust and dirt in the streets, so that the mud became very deep, through which the brigade marched to the dock at Alexandria City. Here it stacked arms, and assisted in loading the baggage and camp equipage on the steamer, concluding which, about 4 or 5 o’clock in the afternoon of the 30th of March, it marched aboard the steamer Constitution, and on the morning of the 1st of April, started down the majestic old Potomac River and our journey for the Peninsula was continued. During the night the steamer ran aground hard and fast on the mud banks off the mouth of Aquia Creek. There was much excitement among the men and officers, as it was supposed that the pilot had purposely grounded the vessel to enable the rebels to put off from the shore in small boats and capture the steamer, which could have been easily accomplished with armed launches, as we had no artillery on board, the vessel being only a transport, with no armament. The men were all aroused, knapsacks packed, guns loaded, and the men stationed in line all around the railing or sides of the vessel, with orders to be and remain in readiness to fall in to repel boarders at a moment's notice. Sentinels were stationed, cautioned to keep a sharp lookout for any object approaching, and give the alarm; but no alarm was given, and after many hours of sleepless anxiety the morning dawned and showed that we were too far out for the rebel artillery on the shore to do us any harm and none was offered. The whistle was blown and signals made for any passing vessels. After a long wait a tug appeared, coming down the river, which was hailed with shouts and cheers by all the soldiers. The tug attached a cable to the steamer, but after repeated efforts failed to pull it out of the mud, and went away in search of help. In the afternoon it returned with two small steamers, and by the united efforts of the three vessels, after the 11th Maine had been temporarily taken on the Kent, the steamer was at last hauled off the banks into the channel and again proceeded on its way, much to our relief.

The steamer reached Hampton Roads late in the evening of April 2nd, lay at anchor through the night, under the guns of Fortress Monroe and the Rip Raps, and the next day, April 3d, proceeded up the Roads to Newport News. In passing Sewell's Point, where the rebels had a fort or earthwork and a battery, they shelled us vigorously, but the distance was too great for them to inflict any damage, the shells bursting in the air and the pieces falling in the water before reaching the steamer. That was the first experience we had under fire, which, although harmless, was somewhat terrifying, and gave us a taste of what we might expect in the near future. When near the landing the steamer passed near the sunken men-of-war, Cumberland and Congress, which had, on March 9th, been sunk by the rebel ram Merrimac, which was so badly whipped on the next day, March 10th, by the little Monitor, as to cause her to commit suicide.

On landing at Newport News the regiment went into camp on a large plantation and remained inactive during the arrival of the balance of the army in sufficient force to warrant an advance toward Yorktown, which was not but a few days. At this place clothing and shoes were issued to those in need, ammunition distributed and full preparation made to meet and fight the enemy. On the march from Newport News to Yorktown, in heavy marching order, with full knapsacks, we were taught a severe lesson in marching, which we never forgot, that was to carry in our knapsacks and otherwise just as little as we could possibly get along with and no more. Many of the men on that march threw away overcoats and blankets, besides many other articles, and the roadside was strewn with them for miles. The young fellows, striplings they might be called, stood the march much better than the middle aged, full grown, large men of heavy build, many of whom were entirely disabled from the effects of the long march with their heavy loads, and were sent to hospital and were discharged for disability.

Arriving in front of the fortified City of Yorktown, we went into camp and war in earnest was soon experienced by the boys, who were continually under fire while on the picket line. Nearly every day a detail would be sent out skirmishing and scouting, also parties to dig the trenches and approaches. The roar of cannon and crack of the rifle continuously in the ear, along the whole line from river to river, day and night, kept us all in a fever of excitement. Continued and careful watch was kept to discover any attempt of the enemy to make a sortie or to attack and turn the right or left flank of our line. On April 16 the enemy came out of the right of his works in large force, near Lee's Mills, and fell upon the left of our division with a desperate attempt to turn our left, double it up and raise the siege. Our regiment was sent out, with other troops, and after a short, but severe engagement, the enemy was repulsed and driven in confusion behind his formidable earthworks. This was the first battle engaged in by the regiment and the first baptism of fire, and the boys conducted themselves with great credit, earned and received the commendation of the commanding officer and the officers of the regiment, and a reputation for bravery, coolness and staying qualities under fire which was ever after fully sustained.

On the 4th day of May, while preparing for the usual Sunday morning inspection, a staff officer came riding furiously into camp and up to the colonel's tent, and left orders for the regiment to be ready to march in two hours in light marching order, with three days' rations in haversacks. Promptly on time the regiment marched out of camp, through the woods into an open field in front of and within easy artillery range of the enemy's works; a line of battle was quickly formed, each man, in response to orders, threw off his roll of blankets, haversack and canteen, which were placed together, each company's things in a pile, and a guard left with them, preparatory to making a charge on the works along the entire line. Between our regiment and the earthworks was a wide slashing made by felling the trees outward from the line of works, which made a tangle of trees and tree tops, which it was very difficult to make our way through, especially as the limbs of the trees had been cut off near the outer ends with a sharp axe, making a sharp point to each limb. At the order, the line immediately moved forward on a charge, crawling through, under and over the almost impenetrable tangle, which was at last accomplished, much to our astonishment but satisfaction, without a gun being fired on either side. Climbing the embankment and forming a line inside was the work of but a few minutes, when it was found that the enemy had evacuated the works, taking everything with them, probably the night before. Pursuit was at once begun, the regiment marched all day and until after dark, when we went into bivouac in the woods without blankets or tents, haversacks or canteens, and with nothing to eat, having eaten nothing since early in the morning. During the night a cold, drizzly rain began to fall, which continued until the afternoon of the next day. At daylight of the 5th, the regiment marched through the mud and rain, often over the shoes in the mud, until about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, when heavy firing was heard at the front, when the order was given to double quick, and we went on a run until we reached the line of battle in the open field in front of Fort McGruder, in the suburbs of the city of Williamsburgh, where we lay holding the center of the line of battle in support of a battery of light artillery, and keeping the enemy from our immediate front, when they fell heavily upon the right of our line of battle, held by General Hancock's division, which then was in danger of being overwhelmed, and General Naglee's brigade was ordered to his relief. Our regiment, with the brigade, double quicked through the deep mud to the right and fell in behind Gen'l Hancock's line, and with his troops charged the enemy with fixed bayonets and the Union yell, with such good effect that the enemy turned and fled in confusion from the field, leaving some 600 prisoners in our hands, besides many dead and wounded. When the charge was well over its was quite dark, and the field we were halted in was all tramped and furrowed up as though plowed and the mud was deep and the rain beginning to fall again. We remained in line of battle all night, standing in the mud and the rain drizzling, with no shelter, no blankets and still without food, our greatest concern being the care of our guns and ammunition. The next forenoon the clouds cleared away and we stacked our arms and engaged in collecting the wounded and conveying them to the field hospital for treatment, and in burying the dead, until shortly after noon, when the wagons arrived with the "hard tack," when we were called in and just three of the "B C" biscuit were issued to each man, as a starter toward satisfying a three-days' fast. This was the first mouthful, or taste of food we had since Sunday morning, the 4th, sixty hours before, and with scarcely any sleep or rest during that time, having marched during two days and fought the battle of Williamsburgh.

It seems almost incredible that men could endure such hardships, privation, exposure and exertion; but it is nevertheless true, they did, and only a small percentage were disabled in consequence, although probably not one but felt the effects of it in after years. Some incurred rheumatism and some were stricken with typhoid fever and sent back to hospital, but that was our experience all along the march up the Peninsula: men falling out stricken with swamp or malarial fever, every day, and were left at houses along the route, which were utilized as hospitals. Our knapsacks, which contained our change of underclothing, blankets, towels, soap and other necessaries, and our tents, were left in camp at Yorktown, and we did not see them again until our return to that city the next September, and some of the men never recovered theirs, and many were ruined, with their contents. Our haversacks, containing rations of crackers, pork, tea, coffee and sugar, which we left in piles before the earthworks near Lee's Mills, preparatory to the charge on the works, were never recovered.

In truly light marching order we were in the advance from Williamsburgh on the 9th of May, following closely on the heels of the retreating rebels, over roads deep with mud and strewn with broken wagons and dead horses. Skirmishing all day long, exchanging shots with the enemy's rear skirmish line, sleeping on the ground at night, when not standing camp guard or on the picket line, wading streams, some of them waist deep, struggling through swamps and forcing a way through "deep tangled wild woods," with but little to eat, often days without anything but what we could jayhawk, until the 19th day of May, when we drove the enemy cross the Chickahominy River at a point opposite Richmond, near Bottoms Bridge, some 25 miles from the mouth of the river. At that place the river was some 50 or 60 feet wide, a sluggish, oozy mill stream, at that time fordable; but the bottom and approaches were miry and swampy, with woods and underbrush on the bluffs. All the bridges by which it was previously crossed had been destroyed by the rebels in their retreat, before our steady advance. On the 20th day of May, 1862, our brigade waded through the river near Bottoms Bridge, without much opposition, none other than the infantry and cavalry rear guard, who made a feeble show of resistance, although they had earthworks all along the brow of the hill, built to resist the passage of the river, but they were all deserted. The balance of the corps followed three days later over a bridge which had in the meantime been constructed of logs fastened together with grapevines, and was ever after known as the "grapevine bridge."

During the next three days, the 24th, 25th and 26th, we were constantly on the move, making reconnaissances and scouting from right to left for miles to locate the position of the enemy, as it was thought they must be securely intrenched not far in our front. A detail, of which 170 were from our regiment, went on a scout toward our left and to within two miles of the James River, and obtained much valuable information. During those three days we scouted in force to within four miles of the city of Richmond, where we could see the steeples of the churches and the formidable earthworks on the outskirts of the city. On the 28th Casey’s Division was assigned a position on the right of the Williamsburgh Turnpike, his left resting on that road and his right on the Richmond and White House R. R., and immediately began intrenching, throwing up earthworks and digging rifle pits or trenches. Naglee’s Brigade was posted on the Williamsburgh road, with the exception of the 56th Regiment, which was sent out on the picket line, nearly a mile in advance of the camps, with the reserve on the railroad about a quarter of a mile in rear of the picket line; the picket line extending across and at right angles with the railroad. We remained on the picket line until some time after the attack on the 31st, which was made between 12 and 1 o’clock in the day time, on the Williamsburgh Pike, more than a mile to the left of our position, and until the advanced line had been driven back a half mile or more to the edge of the woods, and had formed a line of battle on the brow of a ridge. Our pickets on the advance of the rebel force in our immediate front, fell slowly back to the reserve which had been formed in line of battle in the bushes on the left of the railroad, where we captured a number of the enemy’s shirmishers as they came out of the bushes right into our line. Before the enemy's line of battle reached us we were ordered by a staff officer to march to the rear and to the left of our division and about a quarter of a mile in advance of our line of battle, where we took position in an open field about half way between the two pieces of woods, the one in our front and the other in our rear, which position was also about half way between the two lines of battle, as the rebels were then forming in the edge of the woods in our front.

We were placed in that position to support Spratt's Battery, which had been ordered to occupy a position just at our right and rear, but the battery never gained the position assigned to it, as the captain feared the low, swampy ground in the rear of the position, and that if he was forced to retire his guns would be lost in the miry ground, and so he stayed in the rear and left us lying flat on the ground fully exposed to the plunging fire of the artillery from the redoubts occupied by the enemy near the Williamsburgh road, which being unopposed by our artillery, soon became terribly effective and most deadly, the shells striking in our ranks and killing the men at a fearful rate. While lying there we discovered a long line of troops in the edge of the woods in our front, marching to their left and to our right and across our flank. We were about to open fire on them without orders, but were ordered not to fire as they were our men; but when they debouched from the woods into the open field on our right flank and delivered a volley at us, it became apparent that they were not Union men, and the order was at once given to fall back and form in the edge of the woods on the right of and extending the line of battle at that place, which we did as quickly as possible, without regard to tactics, and for some two hours fought in that position until relieved by Heintzelman's Corps, when we marched back to the Nine Mile road and went into bivouac in the edge of the woods.

In this battle the forces in the immediate front of Casey's Division were the brigades of Generals Rhodes, Garland and Anderson, and the second largest regimental loss incurred in the Confederate army during the war was sustained by the 6th Alabama, Col. John B. Gordon, Rhodes' Brigade, of D. H. Hill's Division, in front of Naglee's Brigade, of Casey's Division, on that day, in that battle, and our regiment undoubtedly did its full share in contributing to that fearful slaughter, itself losing many in killed, wounded and missing. Col. Van Wyck was severely injured by being struck by a piece of shell, which bent his sword scabbard, knocking it against his leg, and he was lame for a long time. Col. James M. Brown, of the 100th New York, was killed, and the Major of the 104th Pennsylvania, mortally wounded. Casey's division that day opposed a force of not less than thirty thousand brave soldiers, who were determined to either capture us or drive us into the swollen river; but they did neither. In spite of their superior numbers, their fierce and determined charging and fighting, we held our line, which was three times charged upon by the rebels right up to within bayonet reach, and as many times driven back with great slaughter, as our brigade was ordered to do at all hazards, as it was necessary in order to give the balance of the army time to cross the Chickahominy and come up to our line and form, otherwise Casey's and Couch's divisions would have both been captured or wiped out, and in all probability the Army of the Potomac would have been defeated. Our division made one of the most desperate, bloody and obstinate fights of the war, and while we mourned the loss of nearly one half of our number, we had the proud consolation of knowing that by our heroic conduct and stubborn resistance, our division saved the Army of the Potomac from great disaster.

During the night of the 30th it rained very hard all night, causing a flood in the Chickahominy River and filling the bottom land on each side clear to the bluffs, sweeping all the newly constructed bridges away, leaving all the Army of the Potomac on the other side, with only Casey's and Couch's divisions on the Richmond side, with Casey's division a mile or more in advance of Couch's, which was encamped at Seven Pines, and it seemed to the rebels, who had observed our position from a balloon, an easy proposition to suddenly, with a vastly superior force, swoop down upon, surprise and crush the two divisions in detail, which were so widely separated from each other and isolated from the balance of the army, which would be unable to cross the flooded river, and to drive them to the river, capture them, and bear them in triumph to Libby prison. But they learned that northern Yankees, whom they had been taught would not fight, and that one Johnny could whip five of them, could and would fight as well, as bravely and stubbornly as themselves, they of the southern chivalry. This night it rained again continuously. As we had no blankets or tents, and the ground was covered with water, but little if any sleep was obtained. During the night the balance of the army crossed the Chickahominy and formed a line of battle in our front. In the morning at sunrise the rebels appeared in force, coming out of the woods in a long line of battle, but the line in our front drove them back with a magnificent charge.

Naglee's brigade was ordered to defend the crossing on the Chickahominy at the lower or Bottoms bridge, and on June 1 it marched from the front to the rear of the army, and that afternoon, occupied our new position, which we held against all assaults for nearly two weeks. Earthworks were constructed on the side hill, trenches and rifle pits dug near the river, the bridge loosened at the eastern end and swung around and fastened on our side to prevent a sudden rush across by the enemy in the night. A span of 100 feet of the railroad trestle, further up and spanning the river, was cut out, and a battery placed in an earthwork and a combined watch night and day by all the men was vigilantly kept, which, with the fatiguing work, had a disastrous effect on the health and strength of the men. Many became exhausted, many were attacked with malignant swamp or malarial fever, and at the end of the seven days' fight the regiment was materially reduced in number of effective men for duty.

It was a fearful experience: working and fighting night and day; whatever sleep or rest we obtained was enjoyed amid the incessant roar of cannon, the bursting of shells and rattle of small arms, and when General Jackson passed around the right of the army and appeared across the river from us with his whole command and persistently attempted to cross and reach the rear of the army of the Potomac, the situation became critical; but we frustrated every attempt and drove them back into the woods. Shortly after the retreat began, the stores and ammunition were loaded in all the cars that were on that side of the river at Savage Station, or so much thereof as the cars would hold, and the balance piled in a heap and fired. The bursting shells, in addition to the noise of battle, made a pandemonium never to be forgotten by those within hearing. The train was drawn by the only locomotive present, to the top of the incline leading to the bridge, when the engineer pulled the throttle wide open and jumped off. The engine, with full head of steam, together with the impetus given by the heavy train pushing down the steep incline, obtained such fearful headway that it cleared the 100 feet of open space where the span had been cut out, and landed fair on the stone pier on the other side; actually jumped 100 feet; and there hung on the edge of the pier, and as the rear of the boiler settled in the water the boiler burst with a tremendous report, making such a concussion of the air that it actually knocked men off their feet flat on the ground, many hundred feet away. The steam from the exploded boiler rose in a vast round ball to a great height, gradually expanding, becoming larger and larger, but keeping its shape, until apparently the whole heavens became obscured. The explosion of war material with which the train was loaded dismounted a two-gun battery the rebels had planted on the east bank on the railroad in an earthwork thrown up on each side of the track, and the artillerymen fled in terror to the woods in their rear. On the afternoon of the 20th day of June, the last troops passed our position, cheered, and thanked us for holding the crossing, and marched down the river road through the woods toward the James River. Our artillery moved directly after them, under cover of darkness, and our brigade followed as rear guard of the whole army on that road. Our pioneer corps, following in the extreme rear, felled huge pine trees across the road, destroyed all bridges across small streams, gullies and runs; and we marched slowly, with frequent halts, all night long, with the enemy so close to our rear that we could hear them chopping the trees out of the road and removing obstructions.

On reaching White Oak Swamp Creek we found the baggage train of wagons passing over the trestle bridge, hurrying as fast as possible, with a large number standing in the open field waiting to get into line to cross, but the enemy were so close that it was impossible for them all to cross, so a large number were parked, that is packed closely together and set on fire, the horses and mules being successfully taken across. All the animals and as many wagons as possible being across, the supports of the bridge were cut with saws and after the last of our men were safely over, the bridge was pulled from its supports with ropes and toppled over into the creek and set on fire. Our brigade marched on to the field and up the creek and halted while the troops were being disposed, the artillery forming in line near the stream, and lines of battle across the entire field were quickly formed at intervals. After waiting a long time our brigade marched across the field, past line after line of battle stretched across the field clear to the woods, directly in front of which our brigade formed in line of battle on the west side of the road. The artillery was posted near the creek on the bluff in a continuous line from the lower to the upper crossing, some 150 pieces of different calibre.
The enemy soon had his opposing artillery on the opposite bank and opened up all along the line with a most terrible cannonading. The artillery on our side immediately replied, probably not less than 200 cannons thundering for some ten hours, with intervals for the guns to cool, keeping the air full of flying pieces of shell, and balls tearing up the ground and the air full of sulphurous smoke. The pieces of shell could be plainly seen in the air from our position, like unto a flock of birds. They flew over our heads, struck in the woods and in the ground, but fortunately none of our regiment were wounded. The cannonade was more terrifying and awe-inspiring than destructive. We lay all day flat on the ground, expecting every minute to be called into action to repel assaults which were being made all along the line, in attempts of the enemy to cross the stream. The most desperate and determined effort was made at the upper crossing on our left front, where the rebels succeeded in crossing, driving our troops and capturing a battery. They were gradually forcing our men back and were on the left flank of our brigade, when the Irish Brigade, which lay well down to the front, came up on the double quick, between sunset and dark, filed right, and passed in rear of our line, formed line of battle at right angles to and on the left of our brigade, fixed bayonets and charged with a fearful yell and went right through the first line of rebels which was fleeing in confusion, captured and passed to their rear some 300 prisoners and all of the captured artillery with the exception of two pieces which the rebels succeeded in getting across the creek. Darkness put an end to the conflict and the army of the Potomac continued the retreat under cover of darkness, the line of battle immediately in the rear of the line of batteries of artillery filing into the road and marching in column down the road past us into the woods on the way to Malvern Hill, each of the other lines of battle moving up and occupying the place of the line previously in its immediate front. When the line in our front filed into the road our line moved up and took its place and this was the only line remaining and was immediately in rear of the line of artillery, which, as soon as we were in position, began to move by the right flank into the road and passed as noiselessly as possible toward the rear. We remained in that position a long time after the last of the artillery had left the field, some two hours or more, standing waiting for orders to move, in apprehension that the rebels would cross in force above and swoop down in our rear, but the pickets kept up a desultory firing on both sides, giving the enemy the impression that our forces still held our position. At last the order came to move and we filed out into the road in column and marched away as silently as possible for Malvern Hill, where the whole army was disposed on and about the hill, with the artillery, tier above tier on the sides and brow of the slope, and we were the last troops to leave the White Oak Swamp line.

It was about 2 o'clock in the morning when we took up the line of march. On entering the woods the darkness was intense. We were marching as quickly as possible, making no noise, no talking was allowed, when suddenly the intense silence was rudely broken by a most terrific clatter in our rear, apparently of horses' feet, a rattling as of chains or clattering of sabres, and rapidly approaching. We all thought it was rebel cavalry charging us. Our regiment was in the rear and parted, half on the right side of the road and the other half on the left side, in the edge of the bushes, and quickly dressed in line ready to pick off the horsemen as they passed. For a few moments there was some confusion, in getting out of the road and forming lines, and much apprehension. It was a terrifying experience to be suddenly pounced upon in utter darkness and profound silence, utterly unprepared as we were for an attack, and we were more afraid of being trampled under the feet of the horses or being knocked down and run over than of the cavalrymen. But as soon as all were well out of the road, order was at once restored and lines formed, and all our fears vanished and turned to shouts of laughter as a four-mule team with the trace chains dragging at their heels dashed down the road between our lines, and we fell in again in the road and resumed our dreary march.

Our Colonel, who was riding at the head of our regiment, had allowed quite an interval to occur between the regiment ahead and ours, and in the intense darkness failed to observe the road at the left leading from the one we were on toward Malvern Hill, known as the Quaker road, on which the other regiments had marched and which we were to follow on past the Willis Methodist Church, and he marched us a mile or more towards Chapin's Bluff until he was abruptly halted by a rebel picket calling out the familiar challenge, "Who goes there?" But his ever quick wit served him admirably in the critical moment. He at once answered, Yankee fashion, by asking the picket which way the Yankees had taken; what road they had marched on. The picket without suspicion answered quickly that they had taken the Willis Church road and gone toward Malvern Hill. The Colonel asked where that road left the one we were on and was told it was about a mile back, and the Colonel at once gave the command, about face, march. After marching back a short distance we were met by an orderly who had been sent in search of us and who led us across a large open field where the battle of Glendale had been fought the day before and which was dotted with dead bodies of men and horses. On debouching into the field the regiment started on the double-quick step, which was kept up until we reached the Quaker road near Willis Methodist Church and came up with the balance of the brigade, and from that point the brigade marched in double column, past the church, through the woods into the field in front of Malvern Hill just as the sun was rising and the rebel troops were forming in the edge of the woods on our right, having marched alongside of us on a road parallel to the one we were on and about half a mile away, we having plainly heard them for a long time, and reaching the field as soon or sooner than we did.

On the fateful and terrible July 1, 1862, we marched up on the hill and lay down near a large house, on the roof of which our signal corps men were signaling to the gunboats in the James river, directing their fire. The shells from the gunboats fell in the field and woods, doing but little damage to the enemy other than creating a panicky feeling. We lay all day witnesses to the terrible cannonading of 160 of our guns, exposed to shot and shell, expecting every moment to be called upon to assist in repelling the frequent and terrible assaults made by the whole of the Army of Virginia in three divisions, only to be torn to pieces and hurled back again to the cover of the woods by the awful storm of shot, shell and volleys of the infantry supports. Our services were not needed and we lay in reserve in our position until late in the afternoon, when we were moved to the southern slope of the hill near the road, where we remained in bivouac until the morning of the 2nd, when Key’s corps, the last of the army, having passed us on its way to Harrison’s Landing, we took up our march, acting as rear guard, our brigade being in charge of the artillery and wagon trains. At Carter’s Hill our brigade was savagely attacked by the enemy’s advance force, who were following us and determined to capture the artillery and wagon train. The battle was sharp, short, but decisive. We whipped them handsomely, sent them flying back again, and when we were all given up for and reported lost and captured, the whole brigade, artillery wagons and all, we marched proudly to the landing and delivered up our charge without the loss of even a mule, on the evening of July 3, 1862.

The next day all who were able to work in the entire army, including our regiment, were busily engaged felling trees at the front, throwing up breast-works, earth-works for masked batteries, rifle pits and forts, with the expectation that the rebels would attack us immediately, but no forces appeared other than a brigade of cavalry who did nothing more than to watch for a day or so, when they retired out of the reach of our guns, to Malvern Hill, and our picket line was advanced to near the foot of the hill. After completing the fortifications we had a season of comparative rest. The only duties were the usual camp work, such as camp guard mount every morning, standing camp guard, policing, and dress parade, on picket once in a while, and the usual Sunday morning inspection. But little drilling was done, the weather was altogether too hot to permit it. One Sunday General Naglee ordered out the brigade to participate in a division drill in a large field some distance up the river, but after maneuvering an hour or more the men began to fall out from exhaustion and sunstroke. Several fell out and went to a spring, drank freely, and at once expired. The general was obliged to desist and ordered the regiments to return to camp. It was a disastrous event in our history, as many of our men were sunstruck, some died, many were disabled and never recovered, some were discharged in consequence, and all felt the effects of that terrible experience on that extremely hot Sunday for a long time, which will always be remembered by every man who took part in that drill on the banks of the James River.

On the 7th day of July President Lincoln visited the army in the camps at the landing, inspected the outer works, went through the camps of the many regiments, amid the saluting of the artillery and gunboats and the shouts and cheers of the soldiers. He praised the men for their brave efforts, complimented them for the cleanly appearance of the camps, and assured them he had only kindly feelings and best wishes for them and no reproaches for their failure to capture Richmond. His visit was a pleasing incident, cheered up the men, put new confidence into them, made them feel prouder of themselves and more willing to further do and dare.

The rebels after waiting for us to make a move, they expecting the Army of the Potomac to again advance on Richmond, and it not doing so or making any demonstrations whatever, and they evidently not being willing to let us rest in peace undisturbed, resolved and proceeded to wake and stir us up. During the night of July 31, the rebel General French moved 43 cannons across the river and down to and opposite Harrison's Bar, and the next day proceeded to throw shells across the river into the Union camps, and the vessels moored at the wharf and anchored in the river. The sudden, unexpected and unlooked for bombardment created much excitement and a great diversion for a time, and much confusion and calling to arms. Ten men were killed and fifteen wounded, but none of the shells fell in our camp and none of our regiment was injured. The excitement was soon transferred to the rebel troops, as our gunboats which were lying a short distance below the landing immediately moved up at the commencement of the firing and had the rebel batteries disabled and dismounted in short order and sent the artillery-men flying in confusion for Richmond. General McClellan thereupon at once sent a force across the river to Goggin's Point, which was then fortified and held by the Union forces, and we were not troubled further by the enemy during our stay at Harrison's Landing.

On August 5th General Hooker's division and Pleasanton's cavalry advanced toward Malvern Hill with orders to make a night attack, but the guide missing the route in the darkness made the first attempt a failure, only succeeding in apprising the enemy of the approach and probable intentions, but the next night proved a success. While the rebels were not surprised they were driven off and away after a short but sharp engagement, with a loss of 100 prisoners and two brass field pieces. Our regiment was on picket in close proximity to the Hill and heard and in one sense participated in that engagement, as being the advance picket line we served as reserves and stood ready and willing to fight if opportunity offered. Col. Averill with a portion of the cavalry followed up the advantage gained and pushed north as far as White Oak Swamp Creek, driving the 10th Virginia cavalry from that position, capturing 28 men and horses. This successful advance filled us with renewed hope and courage, as we fully believed that a general advance of the whole army was contemplated and that Richmond was to be ours at last. And we were firmly of the belief that we could march right into and capture and hold that city, and that belief was held by the entire army. It was believed also that the rebels expected such a move and prepared to evacuate, and it is a fact, which has since been verified from the evidence of the enemy, that an attack made at that time would have placed McClellan in possession of the city of Richmond and its defences forthwith. The reason the expected advance and attack was not made was that General McClellan had already received orders to withdraw his army by water to Aquia Creek and to attack Richmond from the Rappahannock, and although he and the whole army were most anxious to resume the offensive the embarkation was begun—after driving the rebels away far enough to render the army safe from sudden attack and pursuit—by shipping the sick and most of the artillery at Harrison's Landing, the most of the troops marched to Fortress Monroe. Porter's and Heintzelman's corps, preceded by Averill's cavalry, going on the 14th of August, and Gen. McClellan with the rear guard, consisting of Key's corps, breaking camp and following the army on the 15th, crossing the pontoon bridge across the Chickahominy, which was guarded by gunboats. The bridge was crossed on the morning of the 16th by the advance regiments of the corps; our regiment crossing late in the evening, and were the last infantry troops on the retreat to cross. General Pleasonton with his cavalry bringing up the rear. Our march that day was a severe one. It was extremely hot and dusty and the march was a hurried one, one of great anxiety to reach and cross the river as we firmly expected that the rebels would learn of our departure, follow us up and attack, and we were especially anxious to get under cover of the gunboats. No straggling was allowed or attempted, the men struggled along in the almost intolerable heat, through clouds of choking dust, that proved fatal to many mules and horses, until we had safely gained the other side of the river, when the most of the officers and men fell out, dropped all but exhausted in the bushes by the roadside, fell asleep and rejoined the regiment the next morning. When the regiment emerged from the woods that evening, about 9 o'clock, into a large open field near a large plantation house and stopped to bivouac for the night, not more than 100 men stacked arms, and scarcely an officer other than the mounted ones bivouacked with the regiment. The next forenoon, after all the stragglers had come in, many with blistered feet, the march was resumed, and Key's corps reached Yorktown on the 17th and Heintzelman's corps embarked at that place on the 21st. Our corps, the 4th, Key's was left at Yorktown to cover the embarkation at that place and at Fort Monroe should any rebel force be sent down the Peninsula on the track of our army, and to garrison and hold the works at Yorktown, but no attempt was made to molest us, and the famous Peninsula campaign was ended, and we claim the honor of having been in the advance, of having been the first to cross the Chickahominy, and of reaching and holding the nearest position to Richmond, of participating in all the battles fought, and of being the last in the retreating column, and of successfully executing all and every one of the trusts and duties imposed upon us.
CHAPTER IV.

General Naglee’s brigade remained in and about Yorktown, doing camp and picket duty, digging ditches, demolishing earthworks and building and repairing others, drilling, recruiting our health, replenishing equipments and clothing, to be in readiness for our next campaign. Here a portion of our knapsacks were recovered. They had been loaded on a canal boat or transport at that place and sent to or toward our camp at Harrison’s Landing, but were turned back when it was learned that we were preparing to return. The boat finally reached Yorktown and was unloaded where the knapsacks had been put aboard. Many were lost altogether and were never found or heard of, many were utterly ruined by water and a few turned up in good shape, dry and sound, and we received them and their contents with heartfelt gratitude, greeting them as lost friends, as they contained many things we had brought from home with us.

On the 11th day of December, 1862, Naglee’s brigade, consisting of the 52nd Pennsylvania, 11th Maine, 56th and 100th New York regiments, was ordered on a raid into Gloucester, Kings and Queens counties. We crossed the York river on a ferryboat to Gloucester Point and marched all day, reaching Gloucester city about dusk in the evening, and had a pretty little skirmish, driving the rebels out of the city. Our regiment marched into a large field in the suburbs of the city, having received orders to bivouac in that field, but shortly after dark when we were about disposed for the night, orders were received for the regiment to march into the city, form line in the street opposite the court house square, stack guns, put a guard over the colors, the men to remain at ease on the sidewalk until further orders. The regiment overlapped the square, extending nearly a block on each side. Company F being directly in front of General Naglee’s headquarters, which was in a large mansion on the corner of the street on one side of the square. There was a flock of ducks in the yard in the rear of the house and Gen. Naglee observing them, ordered the cavalrymen constituting his body guard to place them in one of the front rooms of the house and to place a guard on the front porch, adding, that if such precaution was not taken Charley Van Wyck's chicken thieves would have them all before morning. He wanted those ducks for breakfast for himself and staff; but when morning came the ducks were nowhere to be found. During the following two days details from the several regiments were sent out in different directions to gather up and bring into the city and camps all the serviceable horses and mules, all the fat hogs, sheep and cattle to be found. This was done, and a large number of fat chickens, ducks and geese were also secured, which furnished substantial and greatly relished subsistence for the boys who for so long a time had been fed on hard tack and salt beef.

In the evening of the 14th, the other regiments having all left with the horses, mules and cattle for Yorktown, the 56th regiment was ordered to drive the 500 fat hogs, which had been fattened on the surrounding plantations by the rebels for their army and had been gathered in by our brigade and placed altogether in one large pen, to Gloucester Point. General Naglee evidently thought the 56th boys being farmer lads were better calculated to drive swine and knew how better than the men of the other regiments. But his faith in us as hog drovers was rudely shaken, as not one of the porkers reached the river with us, as they were stampeded in the first woods we reached after leaving Gloucester. The boys not only knew how to drive hogs, but how not to drive them. We marched all night with a rest of twenty minutes or so about midnight, the enemy closely following, but not in sufficient force to attack us. The cavalry company that brought up the rear was very apprehensive and was continually urging us to move faster until well under the cover of the guns in the forts at Gloucester Point. We bivouacked in the large open field near the landing, threw out a line of pickets in the woods, established a camp guard and waited until all the proceeds of the expedition had been ferried across the river, when our pickets were called in, the regiment fell in, marched to the landing, on to the boat and with our live roosters, frying pans, skillets and other things, were safely landed and in our old camp again. Again we had been intrusted with an important mission, that of guarding the rear of the forces in charge of valuable property, and once again successfully performed that duty, as we had all others we were required to do.
The regiment remained in camp at Yorktown until December 20th, 1862, when the brigade embarked on the ship Montibello, which was towed by a large side-wheel steamer named the Cahaba, and we started on our journey for Morehead City in North Carolina.

While rounding Cape Hatteras a fearful storm of wind and rain arose. Near sunset we saw the little Monitor about a mile to our right, going in the same direction as our vessel, being towed by a lead-colored wooden gunboat. We watched her until darkness shut her from our sight, and that was the last time she was ever seen, as she sank that night with sixteen of her crew, who perished at the bottom of the ocean, with the ironclad machine which had destroyed the Merrimac, for their coffin. The storm raged with great fury, the wind howling a gale, raising large waves. The ship we were on, being towed, and no sails set to steady her, acted like a crazy thing, rearing and pitching and lolling from side to side, displacing everything not made fast, and making it impossible for a person to stand or walk, created consternation among the men, all of whom were below, no one but the sailors being able to remain on deck. Some were praying, some crying, and all in great fear, when suddenly the hawser parted and our ship was adrift, floundering among the waves. This added to our horror; we were certain we would be sent to the bottom of the sea; but as soon as we had been cut loose, the ship heeled up on one side, ceased rolling, and glided along smoothly, but swiftly, with only a slight, graceful, undulating movement, and our fears were quelled. Many of the men went up on deck and assisted the sailors in manipulating the many huge sails, as the vessel was a full rigged ship, called a merchantman. The sailors, assisted by the soldiers, soon had the sails all set, and the ship was headed out to sea, and kept out until the storm had blown itself away and the mountain-like waves had subsided, when the course of the ship was again turned toward Morehead City, which was reached in safety, and we all had an idea that we were pretty fair sailors and knew how to handle a ship in first-class style.

On the 4th of January we disembarked at the dock at Morehead City and could scarcely walk. We acted first as if the dock was rolling and pitching. It was some time before we could accustom ourselves to walking on a level surface that remained level and quiescent. We marched out along the railway about three miles to Carolina City, where we went into camp. Here we remained a few days and suffered considerably from the cold, which was severe enough to freeze water in the ditches; but we had plenty of pitch or fat pine wood, which burned freely and made a terrible black smoke, which blackened our hands and faces until we looked akin to our colored brethren, and it was next to impossible to wash it off. During the time we remained in camp, the men were detailed to repair the railway engines and rolling stock, and in loading supplies and ammunition on the cars for transporation to Newbern. On the 8th day of January, 1863, orders were read on parade which informed us that we had been attached to and now formed a part of the 18th Corps, 2nd Brigade, 2nd Division, with Gen'l Naglee, Division Commander, and Colonel Davis of the 104th Penna., Brigade Commander. When we had the railway in running order and all the supplies forwarded, we broke camp, loaded ourselves and baggage on flat-cars and proceeded to the City of Newbern, where we disembarked marched through the city and proceeded on our expedition, which was out to Trent River to make demonstration, supposed with a view to move on both Wilmington and Weldon, and to draw out the enemy from Knistion, in order to enable our forces to capture that place, all of which was successfully accomplished; also for the purpose of protecting our forces while they were constructing a line of defensive works on the outskirts of the City of Newbern. We remained in the vicinity of Newbern two weeks, marching hither and thither, sleeping on the ground wherever night overtook us, without other covering than our blankets. One night, while sleeping in a cornfield, some of the men lying rolled in their blankets in the hollows between the rows, others crosswise of the rows, it rained powerfully; the rain seemed to fall in bucketsfull and in such volume that the hollows between the ridges were completely filled throughout the entire field. Many of the sleeping boys were completely submerged, other partially, and all of us were obliged to stand, as in many parts of the field even the tops of the ridges were covered. When at last morning came the rain ceased and the water quickly percolated through the sandy soil. The sun came out and quickly dried the ground, but it was a long time before we could get our clothing and blankets wrung out and dried.

While we still remained near Newbern, General Naglee was put in command of a division, and thereupon ceased to command our brigade. On taking leave of his old brigade he had commanded through all the Peninsular campaign, he issued the following order, which was read to each of the regiments, on dress parade, on the 17th day of January, 1863:

" Headquarters, Naglee's Division,
" Newbern, N. C., Jan. 8, 1863.

" General Orders No. 3.

" The several regiments of the late 1st Brigade, commanded by " General Naglee, will inscribe upon their banners the following
" names, indicating important events in the history of the war, in " which they acted a conspicuous part, namely:

" Lee's Mills, April 29, 1862. 104th and 52d Penna. Vols., 11th
" Maine, 56th and 100th N. Y. Vols.

" Williamsburgh, May 5th, 1862, 104th and 52d Penna. Vols.,
" 11th Maine, 56th and 100th N. Y. Vols.

" Yorktown, August 17th to Dec. 31, 1862. 104th and 52d
" Penna. Vols., 11th Maine, 56th, 81st, 98th, 100th N. Y., and Ind.
" Batt., N. Y. Vols.

" The general lately commanding the Brigade most happily takes
" this occasion to congratulate the officers and soldiers with whom " he has been so intimately associated.

" Whilst memory lasts, it will continually recur to the scenes of " deprivation and danger and blood and battle through which you " have passed, and you will remember your inexperience and discon-
" tent, and then your discipline and friendly happy affiliation.

" All will remember with regret the deadly effects of the swamps
" before Yorktown.
"You were the first in the advance upon Williamsburgh, and "when ordered by General McClellan to support General Hancock, "the enemy gave up the contest.

"On the 19th of May, at Bottoms Bridge, you waded waist deep "in the swamps of the Chickahominy, you drove away the enemy "and were the first to cross the stream.

"On the 23d, 170 of your number made a reconnaissance from "Bottoms Bridge to the James River, near Drury's Bluff, and re- "turned, bringing valuable information.

"On the 24th, 25th and 26th, after other troops had failed, you "made the gallant, dashing reconnaissance of the Seven Pines, driv- "ing the superior force of General Stewart from Bottom's Bridge "to within four and a half miles of Richmond, the position nearest "that city ever occupied by our troops.

"On the 31st of May, at 'Fair Oaks,' or 'Seven Pines,' occupy- "the above advanced position, your brigade made the most desper- "ate, bloody, obstinate fight of the war, and while we mourn the loss "of one-half of our comrades in arms, you have the consolation of "knowing that by their heroic sacrifice, and your stubborn resis- "tance, you saved the Army of the Potomac from great disaster.

"On the 27th, 28th and 29th of June, the Rebel General Jackson "hurled his immense force suddenly upon our right and passed that "flank of the army, and all turned with extreme solicitude towards "the rear at Bottoms Bridge, which, if crossed, would result in irre- "trievable ruin. And it should be a source of great pride and satisfac- "tion in the future to remember that all this intense anxiety was "dispelled, and all breathed with relief and felt secure when it "rapidly ran through the army that Naglee's Brigade had destroy- "ed the bridges and stood night and days for three days in the "middle of the Chickahominy swamp, successfully and continually "resisting its passage.'

"Again on the following day, you held a post of the greatest im- "portance and danger. At the White Oak Swamp the most deter- "mined efforts of the enemy to cross the bridge in pursuit of our "army were thwarted by our artillery, and you stood for ten hours, "supporting it, quiet spectators of the most terrific cannonade, while "other regiments were only kept in place by being ordered back "when they approached your line. Retreating all night, you stood "ready in position on the following day, expecting to be ordered to "take part in the battle at Malvern Hill.

"Retreating again all night, at Carter's Hill, on the 2nd of July, "you stood by the artillery and wagon train, and when all expected "it would be destroyed, you brought it safely to Harrison's Landing.

"During December you destroyed a dozen large salt works in "Mathews County, Virginia, and drove the Rangers from that, and "Gloucester, Middlesex, King and Queen counties; captured large "herds intended for the rebel army and destroyed all of their barracks, stables and stores.

"At Yorktown, from August to the end of December, you have restored the works at that place and Gloucester Point, and they are by your labor rendered strong and defensible.

"Thus is yours the honor of having been the first to pass, and the last to leave, the Chickahominy, and while you led the advance from this memorable place to near Richmond, you were last in the retreating column, when after seven days' constant fighting, it reached a place of security and rest at Harrison's Landing.

"Your descendants for generations will boast of the gallant conduct of the regiments to which you belong, and when all are laid in the dust, history will still proclaim the glorious deeds performed by you.

"Go on! 'The truth is mighty and will prevail.' Pretenders for a time may rob you of your just deserts, but as you have experienced, their evil report will certainly be exposed; for your many friends at home, ever watchful and identified with your reputation, will see that justice shall be done.

"A new page in your history is about to be written; let it be still more brilliant than that already known. Your past good conduct has won the warmest esteem and confidence of your late Brigade Commander; he has no apprehensions for the future.

"By Command of

"Brig. Gen. Henry M. Naglee,
"Commanding Division.

"Geo. H. Johnston,
"Capt. and A. A. G."
CHAPTER V.

Trip to Port Royal Harbor, S. C.—Camp on St. Helena Island—Trip to Seabrook Island—Various Attacks on that Island—Experience with Snakes and Reptiles—Capture of Works on South End of Morris Island—Repulse Georgia Troops—In Camp on Folly Island.

The object of the expedition to Newbern and beyond, being accomplished, we returned to the city and took cars for Morehead City, after a stay of two weeks near Newbern. Reaching Morehead city, we embarked, on the 27th day of January, 1863, on a transport, one of a large fleet. The day was exceedingly unpitios, very windy, and the waves ran very high, and when the vessels reached the open sea they were scattered in every direction, but the vessel we were on was large, seaworthy, with strong machinery, and steamed ahead without seeming difficulty. On the last day of January we anchored in Port Royal Harbor, S. C., and remained on board the vessel until February 6th, when we landed on St. Helena Island, a few miles above Hilton Head.

We remained on that island, drilling and pursuing the usual routine of camp life, waiting for the preparations incident to the attack on Charleston, until about April 1, 1863, when we embarked on a transport and proceeded to Seabrook Island, where we encamped in the woods near the shore of Edisto Harbor, in which the monitors and gunboats lay at anchor. The men were landed in small boats and on rafts constructed by laying planks on air bags of rubber. The horses were pushed overboard and forced to swim ashore. The gunboats covered our landing by shelling the woods and throwing grape and canister.

On landing our forces followed the retreating enemy through the woods and established a picket line in the fields, and edge of the woods on the northerly end of the island with some loss in wounded. During our stay at that camp the enemy attacked repeatedly, made night forays, captured several picket posts, but fortunately did not capture any of our regiment, although they made a bold attempt one dark night, with a company which marched down the seashore and filed, as they supposed, in the rear of the post on a sand hill, where the enemy had observed the pickets being posted early in the previous evening. But our boys, anticipating just such a move, showed them a Yankee trick by removing, after dark, to a sand hill some distance nearer camp, and when the rebels were discovered in the attempt and the reserves being called on and hurried to the rescue, the Johnnies hurried back without any Yankee prisoners. We had a hot time in many respects during our stay on that island. The rebels made it hot for us all the time, night and day, in their determination to dislodge us; the weather was extremely hot, and the snakes were both large and plentiful, of all kinds, and they were continually showing up, even in the camp; but fortunately not one of the boys was bitten. One of the men killed a rattlesnake that measured full six feet in length.

It was a terrible island, full of snakes and all kinds of vermin of: the creeping, crawling, swimming and flying kind, the bayous full of alligators, water snakes, lizards and frogs; the ground infested, with many kinds of poisonous snakes, tarantulas, and other poisonous reptiles, and the air full of buzzards, birds of prey, mosquitos and malaria. The water was very bad and the heat intense. Our duties were very arduous, and many of the men were sick and unable for duty; the well ones were almost continually on duty of some kind, and the enemy kept us in a continual state of excitement and anxiety.

On this island some of our men captured and tamed two young alligators about eighteen inches in length, and when orders were received to prepare to break camp, they were boxed up and shipped to Barnum in New York City for his museum, where they remained on exhibition until the museum, situated on Park Row, was destroyed by fire, in which they perished.

Large quantities of fish and clams were taken from the inlets, and blackberries from Edisto Island were ripe and plentiful, which furnished a grateful change in our diet. While on this island our regiment was temporarily brigaded with that of General Howell, in General Ferry's division, under General O. A. Gilmore, in command of the Tenth Corps, in the operations before Charleston. He matured his plans and perfected all details, even to having rafts of logs constructed before the bows of the monitors and gunboats, and on both sides also, which was done in Edisto harbor to protect the vessels from torpedoes. He decided to make a descent by surprise on the south end of Morris Island, which was well known to be strongly fortified and held, which being taken was to be firmly held as a base of operations against Forts Wagner and Gregg.
It was thought that the capture of Fort Wagner would inevitably cause the fall of the earthworks at Cumming's Point and enable the planting of a battery or batteries within a mile of Fort Sumter, and within shelling distance of Charleston city itself, all of which was accomplished in due time. To distract the attention of the enemy from the attack, as well as to prevent a concentration of troops from a distance at that place to assist in repelling the proposed attack, Gen. A. H. Terry, with his division, which included our regiment, was sent up the Stono River to James Island, to make a demonstration, and Gen'l Higginson went up the Edisto River to cut the railroad to prevent reinforcements from Savannah. The movement of our division proved a success, as we prevented the enemy from leaving by distracting his attention from the real point of danger, and in also causing a large force to withdraw from Morris Island, where they were badly needed, to confront us on James Island, where they were not needed.

While we were maneuvering and making a great demonstration, General Vogdes and General Saxton were mounting guns in batteries within speaking distance of the rebel pickets, and disposing their troops behind the sand hills in the woods on the south end of the island. When all was ready General Terry, with his division, 4,000 strong, was quietly transferred to Folly Island in the night and kept out of sight of the enemy pending the necessary disposition of the troops for the attack. All being at length in readiness, our division was conveyed up the Stono River on the afternoon of the 8th of July, and made a demonstration or show of attacking the works on the south end of James Island, and General Strong, with 2,000 men, silently embarked on the evening of the 9th of July, in small boats, in Folly River, and rowed silently to the junction of Lighthouse Inlet, and halted behind a screen of marsh grass.

On the morning of the 10th, General Vogdes opened with his batteries on the rebel earthworks, and the ironclads Catskill, Montauk, Nahant and Weehawken opened a crossfire, which was kept up all day: the ironclads paying their compliments mainly to Fort Wagner and Battery Gregg.

After about two hours cannonade, General Strong landed his men, and under a hot fire of the enemy's batteries and musketry, carried all of the enemy's works on the south end of Morris Island, and our regiment, with General Terry's division, remained on James Island.
On July 16th, at daybreak, our division was attacked by a superior force, consisting of Georgia troops, just arrived from Virginia, who, expecting to surprise us, advanced rapidly, driving in the 54th Massachusetts, then on the picket line. But they found us wide awake and ready for them, and with the assistance of the gunboats Pawnee, Huron, Marblehead, John Adams and Mayflower, made it so hot for them that they were easily driven off, with a loss of some 200 prisoners, which fell into our hands.

Shortly after that battle we proceeded direct to Folly Island, where we remained in camp until the 16th of August. During our stay on Folly Island the bombardment of Forts Wagner and Gregg was in progress; mortars and siege guns were brought to Morris Island and mounted, the swamp angel battery was being constructed. Fort Wagner was assaulted by General Strong's brigade, led by the 54th Massachusetts, which assault was repulsed, the loss to our forces being some 1,500.

Those were perilous times. The weather was extremely hot and the almost continual roar of guns from our batteries and gunboats, and the rebel batteries and forts, gave us but little rest, and our duties were very arduous.
CHAPTER VI.

On the 16th of August, 1863, we embarked for Beaufort, S. C., arriving at that city on the 19th and went into camp in a beautiful grove of large live oak trees, in the suburbs of the city, with but few members fit for duty. Severe, continuous hard fighting, fever and ague and other diseases consequent upon exposure, extreme heat, bad water, insufficient, poor food, deadly malarial air of the swamps, hard marches, guard and picket duty, hard labor, and loss of rest and sleep made it necessary to recruit our health as well as the strength of the regiment, which was sadly reduced in numbers. Many had died, and very many sent to hospitals suffering from fever, diarrhoea and diseases of various kinds incident to the climate and hard service. Our regiment remained at Beaufort in camp, doing camp, picket, fatigue and provost guard duty, with the exception of our expedition to Johns Island the fore part of July, 1864, until September 3d, 1864.

We had fairly good times at Beaufort, living well, with comfortable, clean quarters, cool evenings and sea breezes.

We maintained pickets on St. Helena and Ladies Island, at Pigeon Point, Shell Bridge, and all around the eastern, northern and western sides of the island we were camped on. This was called Port Royal or Beaufort Island. Nearly the whole regiment would frequently go on picket on the northern shore of the island, with reserves at the ferry, about a half mile in the rear, on the shell road, remaining two or three weeks at a time. At such times we were enabled to gather large quantities of oysters, catch fish, get fresh sweet potatoes and peanuts, which the natives called "goobers," and have a good time generally.

The rebel pickets were posted opposite our lines on the shore of the river, within hailing and rifle shot distance, but in accordance with a mutual understanding and agreement no shots were fired by the pickets at each other. At night the picket posts on each side were advanced at the ferry to the ends of the causeway, bringing them within about 150 feet of each other, and the men on each post would build a fire at the end of the causeway, sit around it and converse with each other every night. They visited the boys in gray after the grand rounds by means of a dugout some of the boys found astray in the marsh, and exchanged coffee for tobacco and newspapers. One night three of our boys, while on a visit at the rebel post and sitting around the fire in conversation with rebel boys were surprised by the "rounds" putting in a sudden and unexpected appearance at an unusual hour, and were by the rebel officers taken prisoners and sent to the rebel general in command of the forces at that place, who, when he learned all the circumstances attending their alleged capture, ordered them returned to their command, and they were, in accordance with that order, delivered to us at the Ferry.

A large number of sick and wounded were sent to the City of Beaufort from the army of the south, and many of the large houses or mansions were occupied and used as hospitals. Large tents were also used for that purpose, and a smallpox hospital was established at Pigeon Point, and quite a number of our regiment were detailed as attendants or nurses in the various hospitals, and several were detailed as clerks in the several offices in the city, also as teamsters, surveyors and mechanics.

In February, 1864, the regiment veteranized, that is, the members, or the greater portion of them re-enlisted for three years or during the war. It became a veteran regiment Feb. 29, 1864, and was duly mustered in as such. On March 10, 1864, it went North on veteran furlough, returning on May 18th in command of Lieut. Col. Tyler.

In the meantime, during our stay at Beaufort, recruiting for our regiment had been steadily prosecuted by some of our officers detailed and sent North for that purpose, and some 400 new men joined our regiment and were apportioned to the several companies, and thoroughly drilled and disciplined, making our regiment again an efficient organization.
CHAPTER VII.

Journey from Beaufort to Johns Island—Aground in Edisto Inlet—Most Trying and Severe March of the War—Many Sunstrokes—Two Colored Soldiers Mutilated by Rebel Guerrillas—Two Mounted Aids Fired at by Colored Troops—Bivouac on Matthew’s Plantation—A Surgeon’s Mistake in Answering a Challenge—Attacked by the Enemy—Demoralized
Them—Return to Old Camp at Beaufort After Successful Expedition—Assisted in Siege of Charleston.

Friday, July 1st, 1864, the regiment embarked at Beaufort on a freight steamer and left there during the forenoon of that day, under orders to proceed to Johns Island, near Charleston, to make a demonstration and draw out the enemy in order to facilitate the capture of Fort Johnson on James Island, which was approached by the 52d Pennsylvania of our brigade by means of small boats. We reached Hilton Head and lay there until dark when the steamer went outside, and when some three miles away we struck on a sand bar and stayed there all night, with the sea running high and the waves breaking on the bar, and the vessel leaking so badly that above 150 men with buckets, in addition to the steam pumps, were required to keep the water from putting out the fires under the boilers. About sunrise the tide floated the vessel off the bar, when on making more steam so as to proceed, a steam pipe burst and the boat was then so badly disabled that the captain hailed a passing steamer, which took us in tow and landed us at the dock at Hilton Head about 8 o’clock a. m. The regiment then went aboard the steamer Beaufort and about noon we started again on our voyage.
About sundown we reached North Edisto Inlet, where we ran aground again hard and fast on the south end of Seabrook Island and not more than three hundred feet from the end of the dock. The tide was going out, and we had to remain in that position until the tide was full, which was early the next morning, when the steamer floated clear and was run up to the dock and the regiment went ashore and marched about five miles to the Seabrook plantation and rested until noon; then marched four miles farther, crossing to Johns Island on a temporary bridge, and bivouacked for the night at a place called Parker’s.
We formed part of General J. P. Hatch's division, consisting of General Saxton's and Colonel Davis' brigades, in all, about 3,000 men.

On Monday, July 4th, our division marched, with frequent rests, until noon, and halted on Dr. Mathew's plantation near the Kiawah River. This short march was probably the most trying and severe one we had during the war. It appeared to be the hottest day we ever experienced, and many were sunstruck, and several died from the effects of the extreme heat. The road was a bed of soft, hot sand and the bushes and trees on both sides were close to the sides of the road and very high, thus completely shutting out any breeze that might be blowing. During the afternoon and evening heavy thunder showers deluged the men and saturated the ground thoroughly, on which we were obliged to sleep.

About four o'clock the next morning we started on our march and continued until noon and halted about seven miles from Charleston and remained until three o'clock in the afternoon, when word reached us that rebel cavalry were in our rear, killing stragglers, whereupon we were ordered back to our starting place.

On this return march, near the intersection of two roads, about two miles from the Matthew's plantation, we saw the bodies of two dead colored soldiers, who had been killed, stripped of their clothing and mutilated by rebel guerrillas, as was supposed, and one of the dead bodies thrown across the other.

The sight of their dead comrades greatly incensed the colored soldiers who accompanied the expedition. Some half mile or so from that place the order was given to open ranks for cavalry, and the colored regiment ahead of us together with our regiment opened ranks on each side of the road, facing inward. Two mounted aids of our troops were seen coming down the road and were recognized by us, but the colored soldiers, in their excitement, opened fire, which continued down the entire line, and the captain and his companion rode the gauntlet through that entire regiment under fire from each side of all the men, and escaped without a scratch to man or horse.

That night we bivouacked on the Matthew's plantation, in the formation of three sides of a square, around the mansion, which was occupied by some of the generals and their staff officers. During the night we were awakened by firing on the picket line, and for a short time much excitement, confusion and anxiety prevailed, which was quickly dispelled when a surgeon of one of the colored regiments reached headquarters from the front.

He was on his way to rejoin his regiment, and when he reached the picket post and was challenged, instead of answering, "United States, friend with the countersign," which was the order for that night, he gave the answer, "Friend with the countersign," when, in accordance with instructions, the whole force of the picket post fired at him without, however, hitting either him or his horse. Thinking that he had run upon some guerrillas, and being too close to turn about and run away, he put spurs to his horse and charged through the picket line and kept on past the other posts, each one of which fired at him and kept firing until he reached headquarters, without having been any of the time in any real danger, as the pickets were all colored men, who were still fearfully worked up and laboring under great excitement over the sight of their murdered, stripped, mutilated and unburied comrades.

The next day about eight a. m. the regiment started toward the front again and went to within about one mile of the place we had turned back from the day previous, where we remained all night in line, without removing our equipments. In the afternoon we were ordered forward about one and a half miles to a place called the Huts, where we were stationed by the side of the road in the woods near a cleared field, about 200 yards across.

Here a regiment passed us, formed line of battle just in the edge of the timber, and charged out over the field. It was a new regiment and had never before been under infantry fire. The day was very warm, and the field was covered with running blackberry vines, which made difficult traveling. As soon as their line emerged from the woods the rebels opened a heavy fire of artillery and infantry, under which, when about half way across the field, they lost their formation and halted to correct their line. While doing this their colonel was disabled and they came back, bringing him with them.

The right of our regiment took possession of the rifle pits along the brook, which earthworks had been occupied by other troops, and remained there all night, about two hundred yards from the edge of the field, and the left of the regiment went back a short distance and remained until the next morning, when it rejoined the right, forming across the road. Companies B, C and D were placed on the picket line in the edge of the woods, overlooking the field behind a bank of earth which had been thrown up and a post and rail fence built upon it. The rebel picket line was on the other side of this field behind a similar bank. No demonstration by either side was made, and at about 8 o’clock p. m. the companies of our regiment were relieved and came back over the bridge and joined the balance of the regiment in the rifle pit, which extended from the swamp on our left, along the brook east of the road, and turned slightly southeast up a slope to within sight of the salt marsh on our right. The opening at the road by the bridge was occupied by two brass twelve-pounder field pieces, at the left of the rifle pit, which was only long enough to accommodate ten companies, and Company C, being the left company, was stationed in the rear of the battery, in which position we remained all night.

The next morning, July 9th, 1864, just after daylight, the rebels attacked our line in force, intending to surprise us in the heavy fog, which hung close to the ground. The pickets first saw their legs, their bodies being indistinguishable in the dense fog, but heard no noise whatever, so silently had they advanced. The pickets belonged to the 144th New York, 157th New York, and 104th Penna. regiments, and were veterans, who retired slowly, firing rapidly, holding the enemy in check to some extent, but who followed closely; giving us ample time to perfect our formation and get ready to receive them. When the pickets reached our line, so we could open fire, the rebels were not more than 100 yards from us. When they received a volley from the whole line and the battery gave them doses of grape and canister in quick succession and at short range, they broke in confusion and fell back to reform for another charge. While they were reforming we could plainly hear the orders of their officers. Company C was placed on the right of the regiment, on the rise of ground, to extend the line, and a two-gun battery posted just behind them on somewhat more elevated ground. When the rebels made their next charge, with their rebel yell, we concluded from the sound that they were school children and weak old men they were sending against us. They were met on their second charge with a withering and enfilading fire that checked them some distance further away than at first and they fell back and formed again. A third time they came, but not so resolutely, or with so terrifying a yell as before, and were met with the discharges of the battery on our right, which had changed its position, and again with an enfilading fire that in connection with the battery on the road and the awful fire from the rifles, completely demoralized them and they returned to their works and troubled us no more.

We remained in the rifle pit and held that line without molestation until noon, when we were relieved by the 9th Maryland colored troops, and marched back to the edge of the woods, about a quarter of a mile in the rear of the battery stationed at the bridge, where we remained until after dark, when the troops began to move toward Legareville, on the Stono River. After all had gone except the regiment in the rifle pits, the 9th Maryland, we followed in the intense darkness, making no noise, until within about a mile of Legareville, when we halted and allowed that regiment to pass us. We then established a picket line around three sides of a cleared field, bordering on a salt marsh, with a tide water stream through its center. The rebels followed the 9th Maryland and soon after midnight came up to our picket post on the road; but as soon as they discovered us they halted, established a picket line without firing and awaited our further pleasure, the two picket lines not more than fifty yards apart, as we discovered at daylight.

The next morning, Sunday the 10th, at daylight, our pickets were withdrawn to the marsh by the bridge, which the engineer corps had built, and the rebel pickets occupied our vacated line, but gave us no trouble whatever.

During the forenoon we marched over the bridge and Company C was detailed to form a deployed line on each side of the end of the same, to protect the engineers in taking up the bridge, which was done, they piling the planks and timbers and burning them, the rebels in the meantime calmly looking on without any attempt at prevention. The regiment in the meantime had marched to Legareville, where Company C rejoined it after the destruction of the bridge. About eleven o'clock a. m. of that day the regiment went aboard the steamer Wyoming, to the music of a couple of mortar schooners, who were sending an occasional shell into the woods to amuse the rebels. As soon as all were on board, the steamer pulled out and sailed down the Stono River, out to sea and up past Hilton Head for Beaufort, which was reached about eleven o'clock that night, and we marched up to our old camp among the oaks, and the Johns Island expedition was a matter of history. And ours was again the honor of fighting in the front and of helping to repel the enemy, of covering the retreat and of safely guarding and covering the embarkation of the troops.
This was one of the most exciting expeditions or scouts we were ever engaged in, and probably the most perilous. Our force was small and many of our men for the first time under fire, and the colored troops an unknown and untried quantity, and being far from supports or reinforcements, made it a perilous undertaking, of which we had a full realization. We however successfully accomplished the object of the expedition and returned to Beaufort, where we remained until September 3, when we moved our camp to Morris Island, and assisted in the siege of Charleston.

During the remainder of July and the month of August the weather was extremely hot and life in camp was disagreeable in consequence. But little drilling was done and nothing to break the monotony of the usual routine of camp duty until July 30th, when five of the companies went on picket some 9 miles away, on the northern side of the island, along the river from Broad River to the brickyard, with the reserve on the shell road about half a mile from the ferry. On the second day of August the other six companies were sent out to the picket line and the whole regiment remained on that duty until ordered in to camp on the first day of September to get ready to go to Morris Island.

During our tour on the picket line many of the men who did not re-enlist or veteranize, were discharged by reason of expiration of term of service, and went to Hilton Head, where they were furnished transportation to New York City.
CHAPTER VIII.

Bid Good-bye to Old Beaufort—Journey to Morris Island—Camp on Morris Island—Experience in Camp beyond adequate description—Under Fire from Rebel Batteries all the Time—Much Disease and Many Deaths—Regiment Speedily Reduced in Numbers—Regiment Recruited—Order to Make Demonstration in Aid of General Sherman.

On Friday, September 2, rations were issued to the men, tents and all camp equipage, including tent floors, stockades, lumber, and everything the men desired to take along to make themselves comfortable in camp on Morris Island, were packed, and the whole of the next day was consumed in carting the immense amount of materials to the dock and loading it on the old ferry boat, John Adams. About five o'clock in the afternoon the regiment marched down through the city to the dock and aboard the vessel, and bid good-bye to old Beaufort, where so many pleasant days had been spent and of which we retain so many pleasant and agreeable recollections.

About nine o'clock we were under way, moving down the bay to Hilton Head, out to sea, bound for our new base of operations. Daylight found us in Stono Inlet, at the south end of Folly Island; moving up Folly River. We reached the dock at Pawnee Landing in the rear of Folly Island, about eight o'clock a.m., and after making fast, the work of unloading was at once commenced. The goods were put on a flat boat and towed by a light draft steamer on the inside route up Folly River, past the rebel fortifications at Secessionville to Light House Creek and down that creek to the dock on Morris Island. The waters of that route being very shallow would allow the passage of only vessels of very light draught. After the flatboat was loaded, Company D was detailed to accompany it, three companies were left to finish unloading the steamer and the balance of the regiment went on the steamer Charles Houghton, by the outside route, to the landing on Morris Island, and marched to the camp. The entire day was consumed in getting all the camp equipage and luggage and commissary stores to camp and the camp established, ready for occupancy. The location of the camp was about one hundred yards from the southwest side of Fort Shaw and about three-fourths of a mile from the south end of Morris Island. From our camp we had a fair view of Fort Sumter and we could see every shot that struck it that was thrown from our batteries, which kept up a continuous firing night and day.

Our experience on that island was simply beyond adequate description. There was not a spear of grass or any living thing in the way of vegetation on the whole island, which was covered with shifting sand that drifted in heaps and ridges like snow, filled our eyes, hair, ears and clothing, and was a source of much discomfort and danger. Our fatigue duty was in itself something awful, and we were under fire from the rebel batteries all the time, night and day. The heat was terrible: during the day the blazing sun poured down its burning rays, heating the sand, which reflected the heat, and at night the fog and mist from the sea, bay and swamps would wet us as thoroughly as a drenching rain. We shoveled sand, carried sand bags to repair the works, while the mortar shells from Fort Moultrie and Battery Bee and the shot and shell from Fort Johnson, were screeching and bursting overhead and in and around the works. We had, however, the grim satisfaction of seeing our shells going into and bursting in the City of Charleston, whose spires we had been so long watching.

Water for drinking and cooking was obtained by digging wells in the sand, and was about on a level with tide water, was brackish and after a time became contaminated from the drainage of the camps. It was the worst and most dangerous water we ever found or used. It was the direct source of much disease and many deaths. The rations, with the exception of bread, which was baked on Folly Island and furnished to us fresh every day, were the regulation army fare. But few vegetables were furnished us at first, and many of the men became affected with scurvy; then more vegetables were supplied.

The regiment speedily became reduced in numbers until barely 600 men were fit for duty and fully one half that number were detailed each day and night for fatigue duty, so that each man was on duty every other day and night in unloading siege guns and ammunition and transporting them some three miles across the sand to the batteries at Cummings Point playing on Fort Sumter; also in unloading quartermaster and commissary stores and removing burst and damaged guns from the batteries to the dock and loading them on vessels.
During our stay on this island recruiting for our regiment was being diligently pursued and new recruits frequently joined us. On October 12th one hundred and twenty-two came to us, but the number of effective men for duty remained about the same, as the old men were being disabled daily in large numbers.

During the month of October, while the days were extremely warm, the nights were very cold, and being without fuel, caused much suffering.

Late in November, 1864, orders came directing General Foster, who was in command of the Department of the South, to make a demonstration in aid of General Sherman, who was expected to shortly appear near Pocotaligo, and to seize the Charleston and Savannah railroad and destroy it near Grahamsville if possible. Brigadier General John P. Hatch, with a division of about 5,500 men, was designated for that purpose.
CHAPTER IX.

On November 26th, orders having been received to get ready to leave in the evening, the day was spent in packing up—all the companies were in marching order except Company D, which was to remain in charge of the camp, as the tents were left and much of the regimental property. About seven o’clock that evening, when quite dark, the regiment, under command of Col. Tyler, marched to the landing on Light House Inlet, and across some flat boats or scows, which formed an extension to the dock, on to the steamer Neptune. While marching aboard one of the officers fell overboard into the water, but was fished out, none the worse for his involuntary bath, which caused some delay. After it became as dark as it would be we were taken across the inlet and landed on the north end of Folly Island, and marched about half way down the east shore on the sand close to the sea, thus preventing the movement from being seen by the enemy from their signal tower at Secessionville. We bivouacked under the cover of a heavy pine woods that night and remained at that place until the next evening, Sunday the 27th, when, after dark, the regiment went aboard the steamer Cosmopolitan and sailed away about eight o'clock p. m. We reached Hilton Head Harbor and anchored that night, where we remained until the next afternoon, when the steamer went to the dock and the 144th Regt. N. Y. I. Vols. came aboard, and we steamed out into the harbor and again anchored. Here we remained until next morning at daylight, when we steamed up Broad River and had not proceeded far when the steamer ran aground, stuck hard and fast, with the tide running out. Another boat came alongside, which we boarded and early in the afternoon arrived at Boyd's Point, but were unable to go ashore, as the engineer corps had not yet arrived, they having gone astray in the fog. They finally arrived with the material for docking and immediately set to work and about four p. m. had the dock so far progressed that our brigade was able to go ashore. We moved out on the road some distance and returned to the landing early in the evening and bivouacked that night.

The next morning, November 30, the brigade, under command of General Potter, marched out on the Grahamsville road toward Honey Hill, and when quite near the hill, marching in column of fours, without any warning shots from skirmishers or any other source, a rebel battery opened on us and sent a shell into our regiment, killing and wounding several of the men. Somebody blundered in having our regiment too close to the skirmish line, if there was one. The regiment immediately went into line of battle and a fierce and bloody battle was fought by our division; our regiment losing 50 in killed and wounded and the division 746 in killed, wounded and missing.

Our division fought bravely and well, but failed to dislodge the enemy. The troops fell back in good order, the enemy not following, to an old church, where we bivouacked that night. The next morning we marched out into an open field, found the enemy had quite a skirmish line, but drove them back and captured some cattle and sheep, which were very acceptable, our rations being quite scanty. We halted when some three miles from the landing and threw up breast works by digging a rifle pit, and also constructed breast works for our light artillery. The next day we lay quiet, behind our works, while the enemy shelled us and our batteries replied. There was also some firing on the picket line and the rebels retired.
The next day, December 30th, a detail under command of an officer was sent out to locate the position of the enemy; when they returned they brought in some sheep and cattle for our regiment. The next day our brigade marched out to near Coosawhatchie bridge with two pieces of artillery and had quite a lively skirmish with the rebels and returned to our old camp. On the following day artillery and skirmish fire was kept up to prevent the enemy from fortifying until noon, when we were ordered to advance, and we marched out about four miles and found the rebels well entrenched, when we returned.

On December 6th, our regiment went aboard the steamer Enoch Dean, sailed up Broad River and landed at Deveaux Neck about noon, where the rebels at once were engaged. Our brigade advanced under a heavy fire and seized a position about one mile from the landing after a severe fight, in which we lost many in killed and wounded, many of whom were new recruits.

That night we bivonacked in the woods and the next day the rebels attacked us with a large force and with great desperation. After a long, fierce, bloody struggle, in which each man fired the sixty rounds he took with him into the fight, and 3,000 more had been issued to the men and used principally by the right wing of our regiment, commanded by Captain Milton, the enemy was handsomely repulsed. Captain Milton was complimented on the field by Col. Tyler, for the gallant conduct of himself and the men under his command.

The enemy retreated, we following slowly and cautiously, with a heavy line of skirmishers well to the front, until the 9th, when their line was developed and we attacked them with determination and fought till noon, meeting with stubborn resistance, but continued to drive them slowly into their earthworks across the railroad. Our regiment encountered the 5th Georgia Regiment in this engagement, drove them from their position, captured their battle flag, or colors, and thereby earned the everlasting respect of the brave boys of that organization, but with a loss to our regiment of 24 killed and wounded.

In this engagement Col. William Stillman, of Cornwall, N. Y., was mortally wounded while leading his regiment, the 26th U. S. Colored Troops, in which there were many colored men from Orange County, who were all good soldiers.
Our batteries were brought up, earthworks hastily constructed for them, which we also occupied, and remained there that night and the next day, the 10th. During the day a number of rebel deserters came into our lines from the front, saying that they were tired of fighting, sick of the war, had lost all hope of success and that with them the war was over.

The next day, the 11th, our division fell back some 500 or 600 yards and established a new line, as the rebel artillery were making things a little too hot for our comfort, and the next day much shelling was indulged in by both sides at the railroad: our object being to drive them away from the railroad and theirs to hold it. During the 12th and 13th several express boxes came to our regiment from friends at home, and the boys had a good time, notwithstanding the shot and shell falling in and about the camp. On December 14th, late in the afternoon, heavy firing was heard in the direction of Savannah, giving us notice that Sherman had arrived at that place. Our camp was thirty-six miles north of that place, forty-four miles by the wagon road, and by the same road seventy miles from Charleston. The next day, the 15th, Col. Van Wyck arrived from the north with a large number of boxes and a lot of tobacco.

During the day, observing a train of cars approaching, the guns of the battery were turned on it and several shells sent toward it, when it at once went back. The 18th, firing was kept up on both sides. In the evening some new recruits for our regiment joined us. Their introduction to the regiment and entering on their duties under fire was something unusual and was considerable of a shock and surprise to them, but they soon became accustomed to it all and proved themselves good soldiers and equal to the occasion. With them came a lot of express boxes from friends at home for some of the boys, which were received with great rejoicing.

While we occupied this line we moved out two times to feel of the enemy and see if they were still in our front, and each time we found them in force and they made it so lively for us that we were very glad to return to our rifle pits.

On the 19th an advance was made by our regiment and other troops, including the Naval Brigade, to cover the pioneers or axemen, who were ordered to make a slashing through the woods in front of the batteries so their guns could have a direct fire on Fort Coosawhatchie, which was successfully accomplished, really under the cover of the woods, as the axemen began chopping at the edge of the wood next to the enemy, cutting each tree nearly off, clear through to the edge next our line, making a strip about one-half mile long by about one hundred yards in width. Then the trees next to our line were felled against those partially severed, and they being jammed down against the others and they against those in their front, the jamming went on clear through the wood, and left a clear, open, straight swath of trees, leaving the fort in plain sight and an open road for our artillery to practice on Fort Coosawhatchie.

On the 22nd, we observed large numbers of rebels appearing, and at intervals saw them on the railroad track on our front, moving north, which indicated that Savannah was taken and that they were fleeing from the wrath to come. On the 23d we received orders to draw and cook three days' rations, and to get ready for a forward movement. In the afternoon it was reported that Savannah was captured, which was received joyfully, and that General Sherman had occupied the city, and further orders were given for us to get under arms and in line before daylight, as Hardee's troops might turn in and surprise us. We remained in readiness, so long as any troops were moving along our front, but they did not appear disposed to attack us, and we were satisfied and willing to have them go on out of our way. All the horses belonging to the officers and wagons were sent to the landing and trees partly cut off so the road could be speedily obstructed if found expedient or necessary.

The following week was one of continued watchfulness, expectation and anxiety. We expected an attack in force at any moment, night or day. We anticipated that the rebel troops leaving Savannah, moving north, would turn from their course in on us and attack us. But we were pretty well fortified, with a line of rifle pits extending clear across the neck from the Tiliifmey River swamp on our right to the Coosawhatchie River swamp on our left; besides, we had the field batteries and a battery in an earthwork at the left, which was about 400 hundred yards from the railroad. We were continually on the alert and the least noise or stir would create intense excitement, but no confusion; every officer and man knew his place and his duty and paid strict attention to business. About every night as soon as it became dark the rebels would try to push cars past our position, using man instead of steam power, but our men were on the alert and would detect the slightest sound. When such movements were observed and reported all our batteries would open on the spot located by the sound, which had the effect of driving them back, and it is believed that none were allowed to pass our position. All the troops at the batteries and in the rifle pits were in line every morning before daylight, in readiness for the expected daylight attack, but to our great relief it never came. The rebels seemed satisfied to keep us where we were.

This was the situation until the 20th, when, since things had been so unusually quiet for so long, it was thought that perhaps there might be only a few of the enemy in our front, and in the afternoon of that day, Col. Tyler was put in command of a force consisting of the 127th New York, 25th Ohio and our regiment, with orders to advance into the woods on our left and feel the enemy, ascertain if possible, his position and strength without bringing on a general engagement. A skirmish line was put out with Captain Cox in command. The enemy was soon found in the woods and their picket line put up a determined and deadly struggle for the continued possession of the woods, which hid their position from our forces. They refused for some time to abandon their picket line, but our reserves coming up, they slowly fell back and we followed until we ascertained their position and strength, which being the object of the movement, we returned to our camps with a loss of seventeen killed and wounded. Captain Cox received a bullet in his shoulder, making a painful and serious wound. The enemy were so strongly entrenched and numerous that our forces were content to leave them in their position and await events.

On December 21st, General Foster received the news of Sherman's capture of Savannah, when he proceeded at once to Ogeechee to meet him. General Sherman directed him to hold his position on the railroad until General Hardee's forces had passed, which was successfully done, but with much shelling on both sides by the batteries, especially during the night: otherwise the situation remained about the same until the 7th of January, 1865, when a rifled gun of the enemy, far to our left, began shelling our position furiously all day and through that night, the shells falling in our camps, but strange to relate, there were no casualties. The next day being Sunday, they rested from their labors and consequently gave us a rest, but on the following day they resumed their practice with as little success.

For nearly a week this gun made it very uninteresting for us, both night and day. The soil at our camp was so sandy and soft that not more than one-half of the percussion shells burst: a few of them struck beyond our line, but nearly all struck inside our regimental camp and not a man was injured by them. During the week from the 7th to the 15th, Hardee's troops were passing our front, and many deserters came into our line, being convinced that the war was virtually over. The 11th the rebels ran a battery out in the open on the other side of the Tillafinny River, and opened a raking fire on the troops in our second line, which caused considerable apprehension, as we were now certain that the long expected attack from Hardee's forces was about to be made. But it took only a very few minutes for our batteries to put them out of business and send them back into the woods under cover, and they gave us no more trouble.

On Saturday, the 14th, it was reported that the rebels were throwing up intrenchments in our front: but the report could not be verified, as nothing could be seen of them at work.

The next day, Sunday the 15th, about eight o'clock in the forenoon, it was discovered that the rebels had left and that our front was uncovered, and our line was pushed out over and beyond the Charleston and Savannah Railroad track, and the work of destroying the road at once began by upsetting the track, piling the ties in heaps, placing the rails on top and firing the heaps. When the rails were red hot in the middle they were twisted and bent around trees and telegraph poles, thus effectually destroying them for future use. This day, the 15th, our regiment took possession of Fort Coosawhatchie. This was an earthwork located on the west bank of the Coosawhatchie River. The Charleston and Savannah Railroad passed through its center from north to south, and the wagon road to Gillisonville ran through from east to west. It was one of the forts located and constructed by General Robert E. Lee during the first year of the war, before he was ordered to Virginia. The embasures were so constructed that most of its fire could be concentrated on the railroad and wagon bridges over the Coosawhatchie River.

We fixed up quarters as best we could and remained in the fort that night. The next day, the 16th, we resumed operations on the railroad track at the Coosawhatchie River and below, toward Savannah, and some of the boys went out on a scout and captured some contraband of war. Some of General Howard's cavalry troops passed through our lines in the morning, being the first of General Sherman's troops we had seen. They told us that quite a force of Blair’s 17th Corps were at Pocataligo bridge, some seven or eight miles to the north of our position.

The next day, the 17th, a foraging squad was sent out and came back well loaded with eatables, and the next day, the 18th, another foraging party was sent out and brought in, among other things, 1,000 plugs of chewing tobacco, 10 head of beef cattle, a few hogs, and a number of chickens. The next day was also devoted to foraging, and some horses, cattle and chickens were brought in for the benefit of the members of the regiment. These foraging expeditions were kept up daily, as our rations were exceedingly meagre, and as we were ostensibly a part of General Sherman’s forces, we fell right in with his style of warfare and made up all deficiencies in our bill of fare from the products of the country in our vicinity, the boys bringing in horses, mules, wagons, hogs, beef cattle, sweet potatoes, etc., so that we had plenty to eat.

On Monday, the 23d, we burned the railroad bridge, preparatory to marching toward Charleston; but for some reason did not start as expected.

On the 27th, General Wm. T. Sherman and General O. O. Howard, with one orderly, visited us in the fort during the afternoon. General Sherman seemed to be in good humor, was pleasant, talked freely, and told us he would not keep us there many days. General J. P. Hatch, our division commander, ordered our brigade, except our regiment, to start early on the morning of the 29th for a point near Pocataligo. He also issued an order, dated January 23, 1865, detailing Col. C. H. Van Wyck to the command of the 1st brigade of our division, relieving General Potter. Col. Van Wyck assumed command and continued in command of a brigade or division of a department thereafter until the close of the war.

Our regiment remained encamped in Fort Coosawhatchie, and the balance of the brigade left us on the 29th to take the place of General Sherman’s forces at Pocataligo, they moving off toward the northwest on the 31st. On the same day a party of foragers from our regiment had a sharp fight with a force of rebels near a place called Robinsonville, and were in rather a precarious situation, when some of General Sherman’s men put in an appearance and helped drive the rebels away.

On the 30th the necessity for foraging ceased, as provisions arrived and we drew eleven days rations, and confined ourselves to our camp, keeping a good lookout for scouting rebels and speculating how long it would be before we could occupy the City of Charleston. We arrived at the conclusion that we were going into that city shortly, and so four of the band boys were dispatched to Morris Island to get the band instruments, so we could march into that long sought stronghold in proper style.

On the 2nd day of February we observed a party consisting of twelve rebels in our front, and two parties were sent out to surround and capture them; but when we had them surrounded, as we supposed, and closed in and around where they were supposed to be, we found them missing. Nothing of interest occurred until the 13th, when the boys of company C presented a gold watch to Captain Wm. T. Calkins, as a token of their regard and esteem, he having but lately returned from the north, where he had been on a sick leave since August, 1864. His health being too poor for him to continue in the service he returned to tender his resignation and settle up his accounts.

On the 16th the regiment marched out of Fort Coosawhatchie, which we had held so long and in which we had many varied experiences with rain storms, hard labor, short rations, gray backs, contrabands, camp and picket duty, skirmishes, sleeping on the ground and other things too numerous to mention, and reached Pocataligo, where we bivouacked during the night a short distance from and just north of the fort at that place. The name of the place was acquired in an unusual and peculiar manner. Many years ago, before there were any houses there, a darkey was driving a mule and cart, when, at that particular spot the mule stopped and refused to budge an inch. All the whipping, pounding, punching, threatening, coaxing and swearing which were applied to him failed to induce him to change position. As is usual in such case, several darkies had gathered around, each one with a suggestion. Finally one old darkey said, "poke he tail, he go." The driver followed the suggestion and the mule at once moved off and resumed his journey. The place was for a long time pointed out and spoken of as the place where the mule responded to the action of "poke he tail," and finally as the place grew to proportions large enough to entitle it to a name, the name Poco-tal-igo was given, which it has ever since retained.

On the 17th the regiment resumed the march, which was continued throughout the day. Near sundown we reached Combahee Ferry, on the Combahee River, which we crossed and went into camp on the high ground beyond.
The next day the regiment marched some eleven miles to the Ashepoo River and bivouacked that night. On the 19th we marched to the South Edisto River to near a place called Jacksonboro, where we camped that night, and a detail of the regiment worked at repairing the bridge. At this place it was reported that the City of Charleston was taken and occupied by the Union forces. We continued working on the bridge during the next day, Monday the 20th, and on the 21st marched across the river and some 12 miles beyond. The next day we marched about seven miles and reached Stono River, where we remained over Sunday at a place called Loundes plantation, about ten miles from where we crossed the Ashley River into Charleston.

During the march from Fort Coosawhatchie to Charleston, our progress was very slow. Our rations were nearly gone and foraging parties were sent out for supplies of meat and potatoes; frequent stops were made for rest, and scouts were out on our left and at the front. There seemed to be no need of being in a hurry and we marched very slowly. The roads were very bad; the frequent rains making them quite muddy and so much travel over them in that condition made them nearly impassable. During the entire march we had no tents, they having been left on Morris Island, and we were compelled to sleep each night with only a blanket for bed and cover.

But all things have an ending, and on the afternoon of the 28th of February, 1865, we reached the Ashley River, across which lay the City of Charleston, our long wished for goal, which had been evacuated. We crossed on the ferry, it being foggy, and it was quite dark before all were over, and the line formed, when we marched through the city to the South Carolina Railroad Depot, near the upper end of the town, in which we slept that night under cover. The next day we found ourselves in a blackened and scarred city, with evidences of destruction and ruin on every hand. The depot of the Northwestern Railroad had been blown up and was an utter ruin, entirely consumed by fire, and the adjoining buildings, covering four squares, bounded by Chapel, Alexander and Washington Streets, were consumed before the fire had been extinguished. General Hardee, on evacuating the city, had ordered that every building, warehouse or shed stored with cotton, be fired by a guard detailed for that purpose. The western side of the city was virtually destroyed, all the public property in the city had been destroyed, all the cotton warehouses, arsenals, quartermaster's stores, railroad bridges, two iron-clads and some vessels in the ship yard.

Horace Greeley, in his "American Conflict, says: "A Yankee correspondent, who joined in the triumphal entry into Charleston, thus described the scene before his eyes. Not a building for blocks here that is exempt from the marks of shot and shell. All have suffered more or less. Here is a fine brown-stone bank building, vacant and deserted, with great, gaping holes in the sides and roof, through which the sun shines and the rain pours; windows and sashes blown out by exploding shell within; plastering knocked down, counters torn up; floors crushed in, and fragments of Mosaic pavement, broken and crushed, lying around on the floor, mingled with bits of statuary, stained glass and broken parts of chandeliers. Ruin within and without. The churches, St. Michaels and St. Philips have not escaped the storms of our projectiles. Their roofs are perforated, their walls wounded, their pillars demolished, and within the pews filled with plastering. From Bay Street, studded with batteries, to Calhoun Street, our shells have carried destruction and desolation and often death with them."

There was a strip some two or three blocks wide, extending clear through the city from one river to the other, in utter ruin from the great fire of 1861, nothing remaining but remains of brick walls and chimneys. The city was utterly desolate and practically ruined; comparatively few blocks were left unharmed in the lower districts. It was a practical illustration of the heroic defence and tenacious holding, of great sacrifices and suffering experienced by the enemy during the four years they had desperately resisted our occupation of their pet city, which had at last fallen into our possession, but only by the strategy of a march many miles away from it, planned by Generals Grant and Sherman.

On the 1st day of March the regiment went on board a train of box cars and started out on the Northeastern Railroad in pursuit of General Hardee's forces, to delay them and if possible prevent them from joining General Johnson's army.

The engine was a wood burner and frequently gave out for lack of fuel, when we would get off and go in search of rails and wood, load up the tender, and when steam was up again, proceed slowly, feeling the way, in fear of torn up rails or other obstruction, until the fuel gave out again, when the same performance would be repeated. About midnight we were brought to a standstill by a burning trestle over Goose Creek, which was some 18 miles from Charleston. As the trestle was ruined beyond repair and we could proceed no farther by cars, we disembarked and bivouacked by the side of the creek until morning. Some time before noon we took up the line of march and toward evening reached the Mott plantation, where we remained through the night of the 2d of March. The next day the regiment marched to a place called Monk's Corners and camped near the old church, in which some of the men slept during the night.

During this last march to Monk's Corners, the road was overflowed with water, so we were obliged to march on the railroad track a part of the day, which was very trying, as the ties were so close together as to make a step from one to another too short, and to step from one over the next and onto the third was impossible.

The next day, March 4th, it rained all day and we marched in the deep mud on the road to Nelson's Ferry, on the Santee River, until noon, when we were ordered to return, not having seen or heard anything of any rebels. Early in the afternoon we reached Monk's Corners again and camped on the east side of the church and remained all night, during which time it rained hard without cessation.

On March 5th we started in a northerly direction and soon reached the Santee Canal. We constructed a temporary bridge across the canal and continued our march north all day, but finding no signs of the enemy. Just before noon we arrived at a place called Bonneau's Station, on the Northeastern Railroad. Continuing our march we arrived early in the evening at St. Stephen's Station. We found no rebels, but they evidently had been gone but a short time, as a large quantity of resin and turpentine, which had been stored at that place for shipment, was burning and was totally consumed.

The next morning, March 6th, the onward march was resumed, and on reaching the Santee River, the advance reported back that the railroad bridge was destroyed and that the water was so high and the swamp so full of water that no crossing could be made. So we were ordered to return. We marched back in a southerly direction on a highway leading to Strawberry ferry on the western branch of the Cooper River. We followed the highway to within about five or six miles of the river and then turned and marched!
down and along the east side of the Cooper River to a place called Calais, near the mouth of the Wando River. Our rations had long ago given out and on the return march along the river we were obliged to forage for subsistence.

On the 9th the ferry boat John Adams took us down the river and landed us in the City of Charleston, on the opposite side from where we first landed, where we remained until the 11th.

On this expedition we marched in all some ninety miles, with varied experiences in the swamps and mud and waters of South Carolina: through a portion of the state that had not been foraged, so we did not lack for food, but had plenty, such as it was. The expedition was composed of General Potter's entire division, consisting of two brigades. Colonel C. H. Van Wyck commanded the first brigade and Colonel Hartwell the second brigade.

With all our hurrying, skirmishing, marching, wading and scouting we were at no time within shooting distance of the valiant soldiers of General Hardee. They seemed to be in a great hurry, not to meet us, but to get somewhere out of sight and reach of the Yankees.

On the morning of the 11th we went aboard a boat fully in the belief that we were destined for another raid or expedition, but were agreeably surprised to find ourselves landed at Mount Pleasant, a beautiful little village on the northerly shore of Charleston harbor. This village is a short distance in the rear of Fort Moultrie and almost directly north from Fort Sumter, and is the only village of any importance on the harbor, and has a very beautiful and healthful location.

We were informed that we were to remain at that place to form a part of the garrison, and we felt that all our marching, fighting, hardships, expeditions and exposures were at last over; that we were going to have an easy, delightful time during the remainder of our service, which we were sure would be of short duration, as we realized that the war was virtually over and that there would be no more fighting. Our thoughts began to turn homeward and we were hopeful of seeing the Northland, or God's country—which we had so long yearned for—in a short time, but we were doomed to disappointment.

After a few days, orders were received for us to get ready to move and take everything with us. Preparations were accordingly made with all dispatch, with much speculation as to our destination.
But the order to move never came, and we were left undisturbed until the 17th, when a squad of the regiment was detailed to go to Morris Island for the baggage which had been left there. Two days were required to gather and transport it to our camp, and on the 19th all was safely brought over; but the greater part of it was practically spoiled. The regiment remained in camp until the second day of April, when Special Order No. 68, Northern District Dept. of the South, was received, directing that five companies of our regiment embark at once for Georgetown, S. C., and report to Brigadier General E. E. Potter.

Major Eliphas Smith was given the command of the five companies, A, B, C, D and E, and embarked, reached Georgetown the same day, and found the 25th Ohio, the 35th U. S. C. Troops, the 157th New York, a detachment of the 4th Mass. Cavalry, and a field battery at that place, under the command of General Potter. Companies A and E remained at that place as a part of the garrison: Company C was put on board of a transport loaded with rations, to guard them while going up the Santee River, and Companies B and D were attached to and formed a part of the 157th regiment, under command of Col. James C. Carmichael, and accompanied the expedition known as the "Kingsville Expedition."
CHAPTER X.

Expedition to Kingsville—Encountered the Enemy—Rebels Slowly and Sullenly Retire—Heavy Rain Storm—Continuous Fighting Every Day—Stern, Earnest War—Sleep Under Difficulties—Enemy in Force—Capture of Guns at Dingle’s Mill—The Fall of Petersburg and Richmond Proclaimed—Capture of Battery Flag by L. Coe Young—Plea from Col. Rhrett to Stop Advance—Advance Postponed—Gen. Potter’s Orders No. 3—Salute Fired from Guns Taken at Dingle’s Mills in Honor of Victories—Kingsville Reached—Plenty to Eat—Printing a Newspaper—Extractions from the Paper.

It was understood that General Sherman had sent orders to General Gilmore, who was in command of the Department of the South, to send a force at once, large enough to reach Kingsville, S. C., and there to destroy all the contraband property found at that important place; to send a sufficient force to destroy it all without fail if it cost 500 men, as he had reliable information that a large amount of quartermaster and commissary stores and ammunition, as well as large trains of cars and several locomotives had been run in that out of the way place for safety, as it was out of the route of Sherman’s march. It was about 135 miles inland from Georgetown, on a branch railroad, which connected the Charleston and Wilmington road with the Charleston and Columbia road, and the rebels had run trains from Columbia and other points on General Sherman’s route to that isolated place, until there were 25 locomotives and more than 200 cars closely packed together on the tracks and switches. The city itself compared quite favorably in size with many of the so called cities on the Peninsula in Virginia, consisting of a small station building and few deserted dwellings and out houses.

When the order was received directing that five companies be sent on the expedition and the companies were detailed, great was the delight of the boys of those companies at the prospect of another raid into the enemy’s country. Rations were cooked and issued, clothing replenished, cartridge boxes filled, guns examined, letters written and mailed for home, blankets rolled to be carried over the shoulder, which, with cartridge box, haversack and canteen, gun and bayonet, constituted each man’s outfit.
After noon on the 2nd day of April, the five companies marched down to the dock at Mount Pleasant, loaded their supplies on the steamer and marched aboard and disposed themselves about the deck. Shortly after the boat steamed away, down Charleston Harbor out to sea, bound for the City of Georgetown, which place was reached in the early evening of that day.

The men remained on board until the next morning, when the companies disembarked on a rickety, rotten old wharf, that appeared as though it ought to have B. C. stamped on it. The paraphernalia of the companies were unloaded and two companies marched out into the suburbs of the city and joined Colonel Carmichael's regiment, as before stated.

Each regiment was assigned its position in the column, the cavalry were sent out in advance, the bugle sounded "forward" and the long march for Kingsville was begun. A few miles out the cavalry encountered a force of the enemy, when the command was halted, a line of skirmishers thrown out and fighting began in earnest and lasted all day, the enemy slowly and sullenly retiring, taking advantage of every advantageous position of shelter and holding the same until they were flanked by our forces and driven out.

They threw every obstacle possible in our way to prevent our advance: burning and destroying all the bridges, felling trees across the roads and throwing up hastily-constructed breast works; but we advanced slowly, but continuously, the column advancing a short distance, then halting and waiting until the rebels were driven from each position, until at length they were found in force in the edge of a wood across a swamp, which swamp was crossed by a causeway. General Potter sent a large detachment to the right, which crossed the swamp and swung around on the enemy's left flank, when they retreated in great haste and in disorder. We crossed the swamp on the causeway and bivouacked for the night. Pickets were thrown well out to the front, guards placed around the camp, and after a supper of hardtack and coffee, we spread our blankets across or between the old cotton or corn rows and lay down for a night's rest on the bosom of old mother earth. During the night it rained, one of those showers peculiar to that climate. It not only rained, but it poured in such quantities that it filled the hollows between the rows or ridges, and not only nearly drowned some of the boys, but wet all of us thoroughly, as well as our blankets. We managed, however, to keep our powder dry.
Further sleep being impossible, we stood around on the ridges until daylight, when the drying process began. Wringing our clothes and blankets, hanging them up on poles in the morning sun, and preparing for breakfast. When we had partaken of our breakfast, and cleaned our guns, our clothing and blankets being about dry, the column was again formed, the pickets were called in to rejoin their respective companies, the camp guards relieved, skirmishers thrown forward and the column again slowly advanced, the skirmishers slowly forcing the enemy back, using the same tactics as before. The rebels would make a stand behind some natural obstruction, such as a piece of woods, a stream, or swamp, or a fence built on an earthwork with ditches on each side, or a bend in the road, or behind buildings, until flanked out of their position, which was always done with a rush and a shout. They would then retire in confusion and disorder, and fall back to another position and hold that until forced out by another flank movement, either to the left or the right. This is the history of each and every day, with but little variation. We were either on the skirmish line, on the flanking party or plodding with the column along the hot and dusty road, or in the pouring rain, in momentary expectation of meeting with a large force of the enemy and having a heavy, pitched battle, with the entire brigade engaged.

We often formed in line of battle with the entire brigade, when it seemed that a large force had been developed, double quicking over the fields covered with vines, weeds and dense underbrush, jumping over ditches, stumbling over cotton or corn rows, wading through swamps filled with stagnant water in the hot sun, then marching back again to the road to take our places in the column. Again, with a flanking force, rushing at double quick around the right or left of the enemy's position, charging the flanks of their line, to the music of the minie balls; and at times the shrieking and bursting of shells made the days not only laborious, dangerous and tiresome, but full of anxiety, expectation and excitement.

At night we would halt almost exhausted; each company would take the position assigned, stack the rifles and prepare the evening meal of coffee, fried bacon and hardtack, then prepare a place to sleep, with evergreen branches sometimes for a bed, when procurable, or perhaps of dried grass, but often on the bare earth.

There was no opportunity to forage, as no one dared leave camp on account of the close proximity and watchfulness of the enemy.
and no camp fires could be lighted. Pickets were sent out well to the front, camp guards stationed around the bivouac, to watch, listen and give timely warning to their sleeping comrades at the first intimation of impending danger. The men could not sit around the camp fire and smoke and tell stories, sing songs, discuss the issues of the war, or have a good time, as was usual with them in camp. This was stern, earnest war and every man realized that unknown dangers confronted us. Great care and circumspection were necessary; that much needed rest and recuperation be had: so they stacked their guns, put a guard over them, and lay down in their clothes, not even removing their shoes, and with their heads on their haversacks, they slept in spite of the roosters crowing around, the mosquitoes, the braying of the mules, rain, fleas, graybacks, and fear of being pounced upon by the rebels, and dreamed sweet dreams of home and peace. Still they were ready and willing, at a moment’s notice, to fall in line at the first alarm, and fight again.

In this manner and under the difficulties and disadvantages mentioned, we forced our way slowly until about the middle of the day of the 9th of April, when we reached a wooded swamp, through which ran a stream of water, on which was a mill pond and a mill known as Dingle’s Mill. Here the skirmishers and column were brought to a halt, having found the enemy in large force, in position, on the other side, with a battery of artillery, disputing our further progress. They put up a pretty lively fight, with their guns throwing shells among our infantry support and skirmishers, assisted by a heavy musketry fire by their infantry. The enemy had burned the bridge across the stream, the stringers yet burning, on which some of our skirmishers crossed under a heavy musketry fire and pushed up close to the enemy’s line, not fifty yards away, and kept up a steady fire. General Potter, after learning the situation and ascertaining and locating the position of the battery, detailed Companies B and D of our regiment and two companies of the 157th New York, placing them in command of Colonel Carmichael, with orders to charge the battery, capture it, silence it, or drive it away. Most gallantly did they obey; charging swiftly and boldly through the swamp in the face of a terrible fusilade from the battery and its infantry support; looking neither to the right or left, unmindful of the gallant comrades falling dead and wounded at their sides, but with eyes to the front, fixed on the guns of the battery they were bound to capture if possible. They bounded forward through the bushes and fell like a cyclone on the enemy and swept them from their guns like chaff.

In the twinkling of an eye, as it were, those belligerent, traitorous old guns were converted into Union guns, which, on the following day, at noon, loudly and joyously proclaimed the fall of Petersburg and Richmond, the capture of the whole army of Northern Virginia, with its commander, General R. E. Lee, and the fall of Selma and Mobile.

That was indeed a proud day! What glorious news! What unbounded joy we felt; what a happy ending of our four years of fighting and campaigning, to capture the last battery, in the last battle, in the last ditch, in the heart of the Confederacy, at the proud, historic City of Sumter, and to boom the glad tiding in thunder tones of joy, with rebel powder and rebel guns, and through the rifts of breaking war clouds to see the gorgeous effulgence of the rays from that sun of national prosperity, who was so soon to show to this great country his glorious face, to be hidden nevermore. But our joy was tempered with sorrow at the loss of fifteen of our comrades killed and wounded.

One of these guns was historic, having been used in the Revolutionary war. The men who charged and captured them were heroic men, with stout hearts. They faced death and looked into the black throats of those horrid guns that belched forth sulphuric fire and smoke and whole hatfuls of grape and canister into their very faces; but they never flinched or halted until they reached the rear of the guns, then to see only the backs of the enemy, who were fleeing into and through the woods in the rear. L. Coe Young, of Company B, than whom no more loyal or brave young man ever breathed, was one of the first to pass through the line of the enemy’s works, who seeing the battery flag in the hands of one of the fleeing gunners, gave chase, and after a sharp run captured the flag and brought it back, and was allowed to retain it in his possession as a personal trophy. The battery was taken out of the woods and works by its captors and presented to General Potter, with their compliments, at the City of Sumter, where our regiment, with the balance of the brigade, encamped for the night. The night passed away without our being disturbed by the enemy, who never thereafter showed himself or troubled us.

The next morning, while making preparations to march, one Colonel Rhrett appeared in our front with a white flag, or flag of truce, and imparted to us the joyful news that Richmond and Peters-burgh had fallen, and General Lee captured with his entire army, adding that in consequence the war was virtually ended. He earnestly requested General Potter to stop the advance of his troops and to return to Charleston, and not destroy any property, or plunder the people, to not molest any of their chickens, cattle, horses, hogs, or sheep, but to leave the inhabitants and their possessions in peace.

The haughty son of chivalry only wasted his breath, for General Potter plainly and emphatically informed him that until his orders were countermanded or modified by loyal, competent authority, he was bound to execute them, war or no war, as he had no official notice that the war was ended or that hostilities had ceased. Nevertheless, the advance was postponed for a little jubilee, and authentic and official notice of the joyful event, which being received, General Potter at once issued General Order Number 3, which was read to the troops that forenoon, and was as follows:

"General Orders No. 3, Hd. Qrs. Provisional Division in the Field,
Sumter, S. C., April 10, 1865.

The Brigadier General commanding, announces to the command the glorious intelligence of the capture of Richmond and Petersburgh, Virginia; Mobile and Selma, Alabama. In honor of these victories, a salute will be fired at noon this day from the guns captured yesterday at Dingle's Mills. The Brigadier General commanding also congratulates the officers and men of this command upon the very handsome success achieved by them yesterday, and returns special thanks to Lieut-Col. Carmichael and the 157th New York, and detachment of the 56th New York, under his command, for the skillful and gallant manner in which they carried the enemy's battery, and drove him in confusion from the field.

By Order of Brigadier General E. E. Potter, Commanding.

Chas. J. Baldwin, First Lieut.,
A. A. A. G."

We had a high old, noisy old, glorious old time that afternoon and evening, and the next morning the forward movement was resumed. We were fresh and joyous, proud of our late achievements and of the praise bestowed upon us. With light hearts, we cheerfully pushed on, with nothing to oppose, for three days, when we reached Kingsville, the place of our destination.
Here we found a large number of locomotives, cars loaded with military stores and ammunition. We proceeded at once to burn and destroy them all, which was done without any opposition or molestation whatever from the rebels. We destroyed twenty-five locomotives by building fires in the furnaces and throwing loaded shells into the fire, thus blowing up and entirely destroying them, rendering them utterly useless. We also burned 260 cars, which were loaded with supplies of all kinds for the rebel army, including much fixed ammunition.

The object of our expedition being accomplished, according to orders, the next morning we turned our faces toward the coast, 135 miles away, without fear of being molested by the enemy, as they had gone to join General Johnson's army in front of General Sherman.

On our march back, the orders not being strict as to keeping in the ranks, or otherwise, we took the liberty to thoroughly explore everything in and out of sight that there was on our route, and for a long distance on each side of our line of march. We visited all of the houses, out-buildings, woods, out-cellars, gardens and wells. We found but few white people, they nearly all had decamped on our approach; but the darkies were there in large numbers and were precious glad and happy to see the "Lincoln sogers." They brought out all the good things for us to eat, showed us where the hams, shoulders and bacon, all nicely smoked and cured, were buried or hidden under the barn floors; brought us boxes of cigars and many bottles of blackberry wine, which we used as medicine. We had no doctors with us, therefore we were obliged to decide for ourselves whether we were sick or not, and each to prescribe for himself. We decided that we were one and all sick and in need of medicine of that kind and quality, and remained sick and ailing as long as the wine lasted, and we made it last as long as possible, and when it was all used up we pronounced ourselves cured. There was no lack of chickens, ducks, geese and turkeys, which we confiscated as our needs demanded.

On the march back all fared alike, officers and men. All had enough and to spare. The march proved to be a continual picnic. On the 19th we reached Georgetown, turned over the precious battery to the ordnance officer and re-embarked on the same steamer that brought us there from Charleston four weeks before, and steamed back to our old camp at Mount Pleasant. Our expeditions, scouting, skirmishing and fighting, with the attending dangers, privations, exposures and hardships were at last ended.

During our short stay at Sumter, the "printer devils" of Company D, took possession of the printing office of the place and printed and issued a newspaper, which they named, "The Banner of Freedom," dated, Sumter, S. C., Monday Morning, April 10, 1865. Following is a portion of its contents:

"The Situation.

"The latest news from General Grant brings the gratifying intelligence of the capture of Richmond and Petersburg. The same advices also assure us of the occupation of Selma and Mobile. The dispatches are to be found in our telegraphic column. They were kindly forwarded by an officer at headquarters. Did not the extreme modesty of this gentleman prevent us, we should speak to the world of his kindness, courtesy and dignity. A salute was fired this 12 m. in honor of the glorious victories won by our arms at Petersburg, Richmond, Mobile and Selma. It was probably refreshing to the rebels of this city, especially as they knew that the salute was fired from the guns captured yesterday evening by the First Brigade at Dingle Mills."

A notice of a recent steamboat explosion in a western paper ends as follows: "The captain swam ashore. So did the chambermaid. She was insured for $15,000 and loaded with iron."

"An Instance of Heroism.

"In the affair of yesterday a gallant deed was performed, which is worthy of commemoration. Private Jacob Brobst, of Company A, 107th O. V. I., advanced with his company on the skirmish line, and when the company was halted on account of not being able to cross the mill dam, Brobst advanced boldly along the causeway and crossed on a burning stringer of the bridge. He was all the time exposed to the musketry fire of the enemy, and when across the bridge, in great danger of being captured by them, as they were not fifty yards away. The brave boy was wounded and must lose his leg. The "chivalry," incompetent to perform such an act, were equally unable to appreciate it, and rained a perfect storm of bullets around him."

"Telegraphic.

Glorious News—The Fight on This Line Ended—Richmond and Petersburg Ours—Mobile and Selma Taken—The Rebel Flag Upside Down—Everything Hunky Dory.

"Richmond and Petersburg have at last succumbed to the valor of our arms. They were taken yesterday at precisely 10 a. m. The correspondent omits the date. General Grant at the head of 190,000 veteran troops, charged through the streets of the city. There was the most terrible slaughter. General Grant encountered General Lee in person, and after much severe fighting killed him and took him prisoner. Grant was himself wounded in twenty-five (25) places, three (3) balls passing through his spinal column and five (5) through his heart. His life is despaired of."

"The Duties of the Hour.

"It behooves those of our readers who may be residents of this town and district, to calmly consider the necessities of their present condition and take such measures as may be for the benefit of themselves and their distracted country. You have suffered and endured enough; have displayed enough of heroism and fortitude to command the respect of the world. But cover it over as you will, hope against hope as you may, it is none the less true that you have been overpowered by numbers, and are a conquered people to-day. Now, what are your duties in this case? What do you owe to your families? What to your country? What to yourselves? That you must submit is certain: in what manner is the question for you to decide, and act upon at once. What is the argument? You desired to throw off your allegiance to the United States Government. The latter would not consent. You persisted with remonstrances, and finally with the sword. It was replied to with the sword. In the contest you have been unsuccessful, and your country is at the mercy of the Federal army. Now, wherever an army goes through an enemy’s country, that country suffers. As long as your attitude towards the United States is such that an army must be kept among you to keep you from openly resisting the national authority, so long will that army consider you as its enemy and treat you accordingly.

"Your best course, then, will be to get rid of an army kept among you for such purposes as soon as possible. We believe that a petition from the citizens of this town and district to the President of the United States, or to General Gilmore, commanding this Department, asking for protection under those circumstances, would be willingly granted, and that a force would be sent here to guard you against the guerrilla bands in the neighborhood. And this force would not come among you as the present has, but to preserve order and insure you all in your rights of person and property. It would equally guard you against depredations by the freed negroes, and under such a regime order and tranquility would be restored.

"You have tried it with force and found that ineffectual. Manifestly, then, you must change your attitude towards the national authority. You must abandon your idol and accept the other doctrines.
Give up slavery and make an open manifestation of your change of position. Ask for the protection of the General Government in support of your declaration."
"While the advance of the Provisional Division, under General Potter, was entering the village of Manning, Clarendon County, on Saturday last, a most cowardly murder was committed by one of 'Carolina's chivalry.' A few men of the 4th Mass. Cavalry were pursuing some mounted rebels, one of whom, finding himself hotly pursued, turned and held up his hands in token of surrender to his nearest pursuer, private Elias B. Pratt, of Company B. The latter approached him, and when close to him, anticipating no danger, the cowardly assassin shot him in the face, killing him almost instantly. The victim of the dastardly act was a good soldier and a general favorite in his company. We regret to say that the murderer escaped; but learn that his comrades had the satisfaction of emptying one traitor's saddle."
CHAPTER XI.

Order to Take Captured Guns to West Point—Taken to Washington's Headquarters, Newburgh—Trace of them Lost by the War Department—Law Passed Allowing them to Remain There.

General C. H. Van Wyck procured an order from Secretary Stanton, who was then Secretary of War, permitting us to take the captured guns with us and turn them over to the ordnance officer at West Point, N. Y. General Van Wyck obeyed the order faithfully in so far as taking them north with us was concerned, but he could not find it in his heart to leave them with, so far as the members of the 56th Regiment and their friends were concerned, the unsympathetic regulars at West Point; so he took them to the old historic City of Newburgh, our rendezvous, and left them at Washington's Headquarters, where they remained in order that we and our relatives and friends could see them on visiting Newburgh.

While the guns were quietly reposing in peace at the last headquarters of General Washington, under whose command one of them had spoken in no uncertain tones for liberty and independence, our great fraternal government, by her ordnance officers, was for a long time, at a loss to locate them, and they were as to them virtually lost, as no trace of them could be found.

The ordnance officer at West Point was communicated with, but he had not received or receipted for them and knew nothing about them and had never heard of them. All the ordnance officers were written to; none of them knew anything about them; the state officers knew nothing about them; the last that could be learned from them was that General Van Wyck had receipted for them and taken them away from Georgetown, S. C., and no reply could be obtained from him as to their disposition by him, or by any of the officials. In the meantime, General Van Wyck, who was a member of Congress, was quietly getting a special act of Congress passed, in which he succeeded, allowing the guns to be carried on the rolls of the ordnance office at West Point, but to remain in the care and custody of the officers and managers of Washington's Headquarters at Newburgh, New York, as a part of the exhibits of war relics at that place, and not to be removed from the grounds.
CHAPTER XII.

Headquarters at Mount Pleasant—Rations Issued to Refugees—Flag Raising at Fort Sumter—Reconstruction Business—Contraband Property Sold—Journey to Summerville—Command Turned Over to Col. Van Wyck—Arrival of the Paymaster—March to Newberry—Accused of Damaging Institute Building—System of Military Regulations—Trials Before Col. Van Wyck—A Few of the Orders in Connection with Trials of Offenders—Trip to the Village of Chester—Orders Received to be Mustered Out.

A few days after the five companies left to join the Kingsville expedition, the other six companies were ordered to go across the river into the breastworks which extended across Charleston Neck. These entrenchments extended clear across the peninsula, from the Ashley River to the Cooper River, some 4 miles from the "Battery" at the lower end of the city, and were not far from the Magnolia Cemetery. Headquarters remained at Mount Pleasant, with Col. Van Wyck in command of the Post, the sick and the five companies, after their return from the Kingsville raid, remaining at that place. There was a detail of the regiment stationed in a large mansion on the west side of the Arsenal Square, which was engaged in provost duty, patrolling the streets of Charleston, both night and day. Rations were issued by our Quartermaster to the destitute citizens of Mount Pleasant and refugees, on presentation of tickets from headquarters. Many formerly wealthy people were provided with daily food for some time, and every day ladies in rich attire, accompanied by negro servants to carry the provisions, would appear at headquarters and apply for such provisions. They were obliged by order to appear and receive the food in person, which was very galling to their pride, but the order was inexorable and necessity compelled them to acquiesce. They would not, however, carry the food, that was too menial; so they brought a colored servant along to tote the basket.

On the 14th day of April, 1865, those of the regiment who were at Mount Pleasant, witnessed the flag raising at Fort Sumter. It was the fourth anniversary of the surrender of that fort to the rebels by Major Anderson; and a large number of citizens from Washington and other cities had come to Charleston to raise, with fitting carnival, the identical flag which had waved over the fort during its first bombardment, and which had been carefully preserved for that very purpose. It was a season of great rejoicing. It was a grand and glorious sight to see that flag mount up to the top of the flagstaff and proudly wave again over that once proud, historic, magnificent fortification, even then impregnable, although in ruins. It was a day and scene never to be forgotten by those who witnessed the imposing spectacle and historic event.

On the 13th day of May, those who were at Mount Pleasant moved over to the City of Charleston, having been ordered to go into the interior to take part in the "reconstruction" business, which consisted in regulating the freedmen's labor, settling differences between the employers and employed, and gathering up property that belonged to the Confederacy, such as horses, mules and wagons, also such of the same kind as had previously been captured from the Union forces. The contraband property thus gathered together was sold at public auction by our quartermaster, who, from the proceeds, turned into the United States Treasury, upwards of $60,000. We also gathered in 1,000 bales of cotton that belonged to the Confederacy, valued at $125,000, which was all turned over to the United States Treasury agents by Colonel Tyler.

On reaching the depot we found that the other six companies which had been stationed in the entrenchments, had already embarked on the cars for Summerville. The five companies were delayed until another train could be made up, when they also embarked for the same place, arriving and joining the balance of the regiment the next day at the beautiful village of Summerville, situated twenty-two miles west of Charleston, on the South Carolina R. R., and on a pine timbered ridge. A very healthy locality and a summer resort before the war.

The regiment went into camp about one-fourth of a mile from and east of the station on the northerly side of the railway. Company L was sent to a place between this place and Charleston to perform guard duty, and Companies C and H were sent some ten miles up the railroad to a place called Ridgeville, on the same duty, and Company I was sent to Monk's Corners. From this place the greater part of the regiment were sent at different times, in detachments, to different places, having in all visited some sixteen counties, doing guard and police duty.
Headquarters remained at Summerville until July 1st. Our first camp at this place being without shade or water, we soon moved to the south side of the railroad track, in front of a large hotel on the same ridge, which was a fine location, and those of the regiment who were left, remained in that camp during the remainder of our stay at that place.

On the 19th of May, 1865, A. S. Hartwell, Colonel and Brevet Brigadier General, turned the command at Summerville over to Colonel C. H. Van Wyck, Brevet Brigadier General, who remained in command of the district during the remainder of the military occupation. Headquarters at that place were located in the large hotel, and the non-commissioned staff had quarters in a cottage. The men who were so fortunate as to be allowed to remain in this camp, were especially favored, as they had a good, easy time of it; but little duty to perform, plenty to eat of that which was good, including soft bread. The several detachments were kept busy going from one place to another, guarding and patrolling and keeping, or trying to keep the peace between the whites and negroes, settling disputes and assisting the planters in the employment or having the negroes to do the planting.

This was the situation until June 15, when the paymaster put in an appearance, and was most heartily welcomed, as the men had not been paid since July 22nd, 1864. The old men received eight month's pay, and such instalment of bounty as was due, and all those whose time was not out before October 1, 1865, were also paid up to February 28, 1865. We were not paid again until the regiment was disbanded and mustered out on Hart's Island, November 10, 1865, although the discharges were made out and signed on October 17, 1865, and state that each man was discharged on that date. The one year men and all those whose time expired previous to October 1, 1865, were paid in full when discharged July 5, 1865.

During the last two weeks in June, while headquarters were at Summerville, many of the men of the regiment, from the several detachments, heard a rumor that the regiment was to be sent to the frontier of Mexico to fight the French. They said they enlisted to put down the rebellion and that they did not propose to do any more fighting; so they quietly hid themselves away home to the North, without so much as asking for leave of absence; consequently were entered on the rolls as deserters and were so reported. They evidently did not think or perhaps did not care for an honorable discharge. As the war had ended and they had enlisted for the war, it was but a technical desertion.

Some time during the last week in June we were ordered to get ready to move to Newberry, some 140 miles northwest from Summerville, to garrison that district, which was to be under the command of Brevet Brigadier General Van Wyck. The several detachments were all called in and all was in readiness and waiting; but the train of cars which was to convey us did not arrive until the night of the 30th of June. In the morning of July 1st we boarded the cars and arrived at Orangeburg, fifty-seven miles on our way, early in the evening. We disembarked at that place, bivouacked for the night, and the next morning, July 2d, started on the march on the state road for Columbia, and camped that night near a tavern at a place called Seawright, twenty-one miles from Orangeburg. The next morning, July 3d, we continued our march, and that night camped just east of Congaree Creek, having marched eighteen miles. The road was good, the country open, but the heat was intense, and much care had to be exercised in marching. Col. Tyler, who was in command of the regiment, was very considerate, and caused frequent stops to be made, giving the men much needed rest and relaxation.

The next morning, the glorious Fourth, the regiment started early in the cool of the morning and reached the Congaree River in front of the City of Columbia about eight o'clock a. m. We continued our marches, day by day, in a leisurely manner, bivouacking at night; passing through that portion of country over which General Sherman's army had passed, and found all the bridges destroyed, also the railroad in the vicinity of Columbia. The Columbia and Greenville road was destroyed as far as Alston, twenty-two miles, so we were obliged to march. We continued our march through Alston, arriving at Newberry, July 9, 1865.

At this place the regiment was quartered in the Newberry College, a Lutheran Theological Institute. It was claimed that the members of the 56th Regiment damaged the building, or caused it to be damaged by stopping up the water pipe leading from the roof, which was flat, with a stone coping, three or four feet high, clear around on the outer edge, thus allowing the water to accumulate in sufficient quantities and at a depth to allow the boys to bathe and wash, and that the weight of water and freezing during the following winter, caused the walls to crack and the roof to leak, requiring the repairing or rebuilding of the walls.

It is reasonably certain that the members of the 56th Regiment did no damage or caused no damage to the building whatever. None of them ever discovered or heard of any damage or knew of any until afterward. The Confederate soldiers had occupied it before our regiment arrived, and it is more than probable that if any damage was caused by its being occupied by soldiers, that they, and they only, were responsible. It is not probable that any of our men were ever on the roof at all. At any rate it is safe to assert that our regiment is the only organization that ever had the distinction of being charged with bathing on a house-top.

This place was headquarters of the Western Division of the Military District of South Carolina, with Brigadier General C. H. Van Wyck in command; Henri B. Loomis, First Lieut. and Adjutant and A. D. C.; Lieut. Perkins, Asst. C. S.; Lieut. A. J. Clements, Quartermaster, and Capt. Cox, Provost Marshal.

The court room in the Court House was used as a hospital, and the other rooms were occupied by the officers as offices. The Quartermaster, Commissioner of Subsistence, and Provost Marshal had offices on the west side of the Square.

After the system of military regulations were worked out and orders promulgated, the regiment was broken up into detachments, each in charge of a commissioned officer, and were sent to the several court houses in thirteen different counties, namely: Lancaster, Fairfield, Chester, York, Union, Newberry, Edgefield, Abbeville, Laurens, Spartanburg, Greenville, Anderson and Pickens. Each officer acted as a magistrate, and the soldiers acted as police.

A detailed account of all that was done during our stay in that district would of itself, fill a good sized book with interesting matter.

The men were kept going from one place to another, at the request of the planters and freedmen, to listen to complaints or to investigate them, and to make arrests; the officers sitting as police magistrates, presiding at the examinations, including charges of whipping colored servants by their employers. Old offenders, on proper complaints being made against them, were brought before the officer in command of the detachment having jurisdiction, and examination held and the evidence submitted to Col. Van Wyck, who made an order disposing of the matter, finally if possible, or holding the offender for trial and punishment by the civil authorities of the county.

Following are a few of the orders made by Col. C. H. Van Wyck, which orders are in themselves explanatory of the proceedings in and disposition of each case:

" Hd. Qrs. Military District, Western S. C., Fourth Separate Brigade.
Newberry, July 15, 1865.

General Order No. 3.

1. The case of John B. ——, by his own statement, shows that he had a conversation with a freedman on his plantation about the contract, who wished to consult a United States officer, to ascertain if it was correct, and so told Mr. ——. He was indignant that the colored man should not confide in him and when he started for this place, seized a shot gun and deliberately fired, the contents entering the arm and back of the negro. As he has been several days in jail, it is ordered that he be released on executing a bond with sufficient security, to keep the peace and appear for trial whenever called.

2. William ——, a clerk in a hotel at this place. Burrel Mayes, whom no one would suppose to be anything but Anglo Saxon, has a taint of African blood. Some time ago he escaped from his master, went to Columbia, volunteered as a soldier under the name of John Brown, in a South Carolina regiment, was wounded in the battle of the Wilderness, captured, sent north, and finally returned as a prisoner of war.

He makes the justification for assault and battery, that Mayes came into the hotel and requested him to take charge of his carpet bag, passing it over the counter. The next day he returned, procured his carpet bag, and went on his way. By some means he learned that Mayes was tainted with African blood; he became enraged that a negro should ask him to do any service, following until he found and commenced beating him. As there is not the shadow of an excuse for his conduct, he must remain in jail until a competent court can punish him as he deserves.

3. John ——, charged by a freedman with beating her, was arrested, and on examination states that he was informed the woman was insolent to his wife, the particulars or provocations for which he did not ascertain; but he took the woman, stripped her naked, tied her down, and then with a leather strap gave twenty-five stripes.

This is clearly a case of assault and battery, and would be punished as such, except that he alleges that he would never have punished the woman had he not supposed he had a right so to do, from the fact that Captain ———, of the 25th Ohio Vols., lately commanding at this place, approved contracts with the power inserted in the employer to punish, and also told them in numerous instances that they could buck and gag and tie up by the thumbs whenever necessary. This is the excuse given for many outrages committed upon the colored people in this section of the state.

That there may be no excuse for future offenses, the Brevet Brigadier General commanding, issues this order, directed to all the districts in his command, viz: Lancaster, Fairfield, Chester, York, Union, Newberry, Edgefield, Abbeville, Laurens, Spartanburg, Greenville, Anderson and Pickens.

Why an officer in the United States service should approve contracts with such a dangerous delegation of power and in addition authorize the exercise of punishment so brutal and inhuman as seldom to be used in the army, is very remarkable.

The contract said the punishment should be lawful: yet no man so stupid but knows that the lawful punishment which slavery imposes, cannot now be allowed to scourge the naked back and limbs of free men and women. Slavery and the lash are synonymous:
you cannot separate one from the other in the mind of the African.
Yet a girl whose insolence may have been produced, as sometimes it is, by violent and threatening language, or insolence, if you please, from the white person, who was of size to be held by his left hand, is tied and beaten on the supposition that it was right, because a United States officer had delegated such power.

The colored people are told they are free, yet under the shield of the United States Government, they are flogged, some of them as they never were before.

There are many persons who feel all the bitterness which the rebellion engendered, and while brooding over the mortification of defeat, loss of property and emancipation of slaves, exhibit the cruel meanness of wreaking vengeance upon the innocent and helpless freedmen.

After the publication of this order like offences will be severely punished. You have sworn to sustain the proclamation of the President; consequently the abolition of slavery.

Such conduct, you will readily see, is a violation of your parole;
a forfeiture of your oath: nearly all the difficulties attending the immediate emancipation of so large a class, and the transition from slave to free labor, could be removed entirely, or greatly mitigated by a cheerful acquiescence on the part of all.

Some very foolish, if not very wicked men, are contributing not only to their own injury, but to that of the entire state. By disregar-ding the rights of the freed man, they contemn and despise the authority of the United States and render necessary the presence of military power, to prevent that which they ought not to do, and to accomplish that they ought to effect.
To-day the spirit of rebellion with some is strong. The spirit of rebellion against the emancipation of slaves, rebellion against the rights freedom grants to all without regard to color or rank.

No one can deny that many are believing slavery will not be destroyed by a refusal of the states to amend the Constitution.

Many are striving to embarrass the system of free labor, with a view to show the world that slavery ought not to be abolished; also to make the condition of the freedmen miserable, so they should feel that their condition was preferable in slavery to freedmen. Another fact is evident that the freedmen have no confidence in their former masters. They look upon them as those through whom for years they have been held in servitude, and who they fear would lose no opportunity to remand them back to slavery.

With these facts conceded, the course of their former master is plain.

The dogma of State rights, as you understood the fatal and bloody delusion of secession, taught from your earlist infancy: slavery, with which you have been reared from the cradle, have, in consequence of your own acts, been forever destroyed.

They are dead, with no more hope of resurrection than a separate confederacy; buried beneath the best blood of the republic, and amidst the graves of hundreds of thousands whom the nation will mourn for years.

You put in peril your own institutions and your own country, to destroy this republic, and failed. Accept now the fruits of the rebellion, bitter though they be, and carry out the terms of your surrender and allegiance in the spirit of chivalric men. Do not, because you may be distant from a military post, visit upon the harmless and unoffending negro, the hostilities and resentment you feel against the United States.

However obnoxious it may be, every man is free and must be treated as such: that done, the whole is accomplished, and nearly every obstacle removed. You have been for years learning the folly of resistance to the government, and have been almost ruined. Surrender now, at the outset, all prejudice against universal liberty. Your own happiness and prosperity demand it. Encourage the system of free labor; develop its resources, and the waste places will blossom once more, and grass grow green on battle plains. Your own welfare depends on the welfare of the colored race. Without his labor your fields will not be cultivated, your wealth not increase. When you make his condition miserable, it reacts and entails the same upon yourself. Treat him kindly; teach him by your acts that you consider him free and desire not to enslave him again, and you restore his confidence.

After four years of bitter war, after you have exhausted all the resources of a mighty section, the prowess of a brave people, you ask that we may be lenient, forgiving and not exasperate your peopeople. What you ask will be granted. The government of the United States, its people, its army, every officer and soldier, will treat you kindly. In return, they ask that what is meted out to you, who have done so much of wrong to yourselves and the republic, shall be cheerfully by you meted out to a people without guilt, who are free because they cannot avoid it, who have not been even required to stretch forth the hand to take the proffered boon: a people faithful while you were absent in the army, neither destroying your lands, houses or family. Yet never known to withhold aid or betray the path of the Union prisoners.

You cannot expect the sudden change in your system of labor to work smoothly at first. The negro is to be taught to discharge the duties and obligations freedom enjoins, as well as a true conception of the rights it guarantees.

He is to be taught that there is no immunity from labor; that in the sweat of his brow must he earn his bread; that he is not entitled to any share of his former master's land, or mules, or stock; that he has only been given the title to himself; that he can no more be sold on the auction block; that the wife cannot be taken from his bosom, the child from his side and sold forever from his sight; that vagrancy and idleness and theft will be punished by the proper authority, because they are crimes in all regulated society; that while he can make contracts, he is bound by them when made, and must fulfill them: that he cannot throw down the hoe and abandon the crop at pleasure, but will be required faithfully to labor and obey his employer in all lawful commands, and not absent himself from his duty without permission: that he must be respectful and courteous: that insolence is no more to be tolerated from a Freeman than a slave.

Most of this instruction must be imparted by their former owners. How necessary that they should learn to recognize the rights and thereby be placed in a position more effectually to teach the duties of freedmen.

Many of the freedmen are declining to sign contracts unless they can be told by proper authority they are right. The power to punish, reserved in some contracts and the continuance of the lash, have moved their suspicions, and they prefer working on, leaving it to the employers to give them what they choose, for fear by making a mark on paper they will sign away some of their liberty. After consultation with citizens of this section, it is proposed to form a basis of remuneration in a general order, which will be just to all, to apply where no contract has been made, and which will extend to all the districts in this command.

The many good citizens who are contributing by word and deed to have accepted the new order of affairs, will deserve well of their state if they can so mould public sentiment that the same spirit which led to rebellion four years ago may now be powerless to embarrass their communities by thwarting the design of the government.
Courts will soon be established in every district within this command as directed by orders from Department Headquarters, where testimony of witnesses will be taken without regard to color.

In order to assist this section of the state to the extent of his power, with a view of more fully explaining to all the planters and freedmen, the nature of their rights and duties, the Brevet Brigadier General commanding will designate three or four places in each district, of which public notice will be given, where he will meet the inhabitants and save many the necessity of a long ride to the Court House town of the district. Planters are requested to inform the freedmen of the time and object of the meeting and encourage them to be present, so their obligations may be explained and misconception as to liberty beyond the law may be corrected.

The clause inserted in former contracts, delegating the power to punish, is hereby declared null and void.

The laws of this state in regard to the distillation of liquors will be enforced. Only fruits in their season and not cereals can be distilled. The sale of liquors will be regulated as your state laws provide. Hereafter none will be sold except by permission of commanding officers of sub. districts.

By command of Brevet Brig. General,

C. H. Van Wyck.

Henri B. Loomis,
First Lieut. and Adjt 56th N. Y. V., A. D. C. and Provost Marshal.

The Western District of South Carolina was divided into different commands, or sub. districts, on August 7th, and Lieut. Colonel Rockwell Tyler, of this regiment, was placed in command, as the following order will more fully show:

"Headquarters, 2d Sub-District of Western S. C.
Newberry, S. C., August 10, 1865.

General Order No. 4.

In compliance with Special Order No. 12 from Head Qrs. Western Dist. of South Carolina, dated August 7, 1865, Lieut. Col. Tyler hereby assumes command of the 2d sub-district of Western South Carolina, comprising the districts of Newberry, Laurens, Abbeville and Edgefield, with headquarters at Newberry. All orders now in existence will remain in force until otherwise ordered. The following named officers are hereby announced on the staff of the Lieut. Col. commanding:

Capt. James J. Cox, 56th N. Y. V. V., Ass’t Provost Judge."
1st Lieut. Wm. J. Sayer, 56th N. Y. V. V., Ass't Provost Marshal.
1st Lieut. A. J. Clements, Q. M. 56th N. Y. V. V., A. A. Q. M.
1st Lieut. Norman Perkins, 56th N. Y. V. V., A. C. S.
2nd Lieut. Andrew P. Conklin, 56th N. Y. V. V., Com. of Labor.
All communications for these headquarters will be addressed to Act. Ass't Adj't General.

By command of
LIEUT. COL. R. TYLER,
Comm’d’g Dist.
HENRI B. LOOMIS,
1st Lieut. and Adj’t 56th N. Y. V. V., A. A. A. Gen’l.”

It was at this place that the property, which was gathered together, was sold by the Q. M., as the following order will show:

“Hd. Qrs. 2d Sub-District, Dist. of Western S. C.
NEWBERRY, S. C., August 11, 1865.

General Order No. 5.
In compliance with instructions received from Head Qrs., District of Western South Carolina, all persons having in their possession any horses, mules, wagons, ambulances, harness, saddles or bridles, medical stores, or any property belonging to the United States Government, or the late Confederacy, will turn in the same to Lieut. A. J. Clements, A. A. Q. M., at Newberry, before the 20th inst.

Commanding officers at Laurens, Abbeville and Edgefield, will enforce this order and forward all property to these headquarters.
Failure to comply with this order will subject the offender to be arrested and punished.

By command of
LIEUT. COL. R. TYLER,
Comm’d’g Dist.
HENRI B. LOOMIS,
1st Lieut. and Adj’t 56th N. Y. V. V., A. A. A. Gen’l.”

By virtue of the order a large amount of property was accumulated at this place and sold at public auction by the quartermaster, as before stated. The cotton spoken of was turned over to the Treasury agents, in compliance with the following instructions, contained in a circular from the War Department:

“2. District and other commanders are again reminded that they are required to deliver to Treasury agents all abandoned or captured cotton in their possession, and will give the agents all needed and proper assistance. The military forces will not, however, be employed in searching for cotton, or will they interfere with the transportation of it, or any of the products of the soil, to market."

In addition to the duties of policing and guarding the property and the interests of all the inhabitants, the duties enjoined by the orders before mentioned and set forth, were diligently enforced and faithfully performed, as is evidenced by the large amount of money realized from the sales, and the value of the cotton turned over to the Treasury agents.

General Van Wyck desiring to go north and visit Washington, procured leave of absence, and on August 24, was relieved and the command turned over to his successor, who took command of the district, and General Van Wyck left for the north, later to join the regiment at Charleston.

The regiment remained performing the same duties as before, in detachments at the several court houses, until September 22d, when the several detachments not on the route to be taken, having been called in to Newberry, all the men then at that place left on the cars, destined for the Village of Chester, S. C.

The order for transportation called for 280 men, six horses and five tons of baggage.

We rode on the cars to Hope Station, where we disembarked and marched to Winsboro, camping one night on the way and arriving there the next day, where we found Company F, which had been stationed at that place for a long time. The regiment took the cars and arrived at Chester that night, September 23d, and remained, performing the same duties as before, for two weeks, less one day.

The regiment occupied the Court House, the floor of which was piled with boxes of records from the different Court Houses on General Sherman's line of march through that state. They had been removed to this place, it being out of his line of march, as a precautionary measure against their destruction, which was unnecessary, as such property was not destroyed, unless by accident.

Our quarters at this place were cramped and disagreeable, and not one of the regiment ever regretted our short stay at that place, under the circumstances.

On Tuesday, September 26, we received a telegraph dispatch from General Van Wyck, stating that he was at New York City and on his way to Washington.
The next mail from the north brought the last lot of commissions from the Governor of the State of New York, for men and officers of the regiment. As the several companies were at that time below the minimum strength, none of the officers receiving commissions at that time could be mustered in the new rank; but they were entitled to the rank the commission gave them, but not the pay, and as the war was ended, it made but little difference.

About the first of October word was received that the regiment was to be mustered out and sent home, and a detail from each company was sent to Charleston to prepare the muster-out rolls, as directed by the Commissary of Musters.

This was the culminating order of what we had been hoping for, waiting for, fighting for, for four long, terrible years: the end of the war; peace; a restored country, and a return to our home and friends and civil life.
CHAPTER XIII.

On the 6th day of October the 25th Ohio Vet. Vol. Infantry, Colonel N. Houghton commanding, relieved the 56th, and the homeward journey was begun on that day. The regiment took cars and rode as far as Winsboro, marching from that place, by easy marches, to Columbia, thence to Kingsville, on the railroad from Columbia to Florence. At Kingsville the regiment took the cars to Florence, from there by the Northeastern Railway, direct to Charleston.

From Winsboro to Kingsville it was about fifty-five miles, and it was a really enjoyable march. The roads were good, the weather pleasant, the days rather warm and the nights cool. It was the last march of the campaign style, as we bivouacked each night where night overtook us, where wood and water were plenty.

The regiment reached the north bank of the Santee River on the 9th, directly opposite from where we turned back when on the Monk's Corner raid in March, by reason of the railroad bridge being destroyed and our inability to cross. Much the same conditions prevailed at this time; but an incline had been constructed on each side, whereby the cars were let down and onto a flat boat, with a railroad track laid thereon, and the boat, with the cars on it, was drawn across by means of a wire cable, and the cars drawn up the opposite incline and onto the main track again.

It was a slow process, and the regiment did not wait to cross in the cars, but ferried themselves over in detachments on the flat boat. The horses could not be taken across in that way, and were taken across in the cars after some days' delay. The regiment took cars after crossing and reached Charleston on the 10th, where they remained until the 15th. General Van Wyck joined the regiment during this time, and was actively engaged in straightening out matters, settling up the regimental business, and all the red tape matters incident to getting us “tied loose” from the military service.

In pursuance of an order by the War Department of the United States, dated June 15, 1865, the members of the regiment were permitted to take home with them, each man his knapsack, haversack and canteen, without charge, and all of them availed themselves of that privilege, and took them home to keep as souvenirs of the war, as they had been furnished by the government.

Many of the men availed themselves of another order, which permitted each man to take his rifle and bayonet, cartridge box and belt, bayonet scabbard, cap box and belt, for the sum of $6.00 for the lot, which was deducted from the pay of each one who availed himself of that privilege.

The distances we had traversed in our last campaign in South Carolina, were about as follows: Beaufort to Morris Island, 70 miles; to Coosawhatchie by way of Honey Hill and Deveaux Neck, 90 miles; to Charleston, 70 miles; to Santee River and return, 80 miles; Kingsville raid, 390 miles; to Newberry, by way of Summerville, Orangeburg, Columbia and Newberry, 166 miles; to Chester, 45 miles; to Charleston, by way of Winsboro, Columbia and Florence, 205 miles. This was during our last year’s service.

As it would take some time to complete the muster-out rolls and make out the discharges, General Van Wyck received permission to take the regiment to New York City and remain on the government reservation and Hart’s Island, until the pay rolls and discharges were received by the paymaster at New York City, when the members would be mustered out.

On the 15th day of October the regiment marched to Adger’s wharf, on the Cooper River, and in the afternoon of that day went on board a steamer bound for Hilton Head, at which place, the next afternoon, October 16, we embarked on the steamship Quaker City, bound for New York City. After a pleasant and uneventful voyage, replete with joyful anticipation, the ship was docked on the south side of pier 13, on the North River, at the foot of Albany Street, New York City, about two o’clock in the afternoon of October 20, 1865. The regiment immediately marched ashore and down to the Battery Barracks, where we were quartered until the afternoon of November 9, 1865.

On disembarking from the steamship Quaker City, the regimental baggage and many things that had been brought with us, were unloaded and left on the pier over night, and during the night nearly everything disappeared, among the things missing were the elevating screws of the guns captured at Dingle's Mills, which were never recovered.

Although the members were supposed to be under strict military rule and discipline, the rules were not enforced; but very few of the officers remained over night at the Battery. They quartered themselves at the Merchant's Hotel in Courtland Street, and the Girard House, which is now the Cosmopolitan; and it is an open question whether all of the men could have been found in their quarters that night.

When the regiment arrived in New York City, every one of the men was out of money. Many wrote home for funds, which were speedily forthcoming; and all were then supplied with funds sufficient to enable the men to bid defiance to government rations.

While we were patiently waiting for the papers from Charleston, enabling us to be discharged, election day was drawing near, November 7th, and the men were very anxious to get home and vote. General Van Wyck had many applications for permits to go home for that purpose; but he had no authority to grant such leave of absence. The order allowing him to take his regiment to New York, required him to keep his men at that place, to be ready for muster out at a moment's notice. Such permit could only be given by General John A. Dix, who was then in command of the military forces at New York, and it was evident that there was no use in making an application to him for such a trip.

As roll calls had long since been discontinued and the absence of any one would not be noted, the only thing to be feared was the arrival of the discharge papers, and a consequent call for the regiment to appear for muster out. As they had learned from previous experience that there would in all probability be a week or perhaps two or more weeks before the papers would arrive, many of the members of the regiment, including the officers, came to the conclusion that they would risk it and take the chances of being charged with disobedience of orders and perhaps of desertion. So they left and went to their several homes in Orange and Sullivan Counties and other places, with the understanding with those remaining that when the papers came a general alarm would be sent out, summoning them to return.
Even General Van Wyck, who was in command of the regiment, went home, and was absent from his command when the papers arrived on the 8th. Word was at once given out and messengers sent in hot haste in all directions to hasten the return of the men; that the papers had arrived at headquarters, and that General Dix had ascertained that most of the regiment, including General Van Wyck, were absent without leave, and there was no telling what might happen. Then there was scurrying in great haste to get back as soon as possible to New York City.

Early in the forenoon of the 9th, General Van Wyck, with all the Orange and Sullivan boys, arrived in the city, when all the members of the regiment were again present or accounted for.

General Van Wyck immediately had an audience with General Dix, in the course of which the whole matter was fixed up, evidently to the satisfaction of all parties concerned and without any trouble. The kindness and forbearance of General Dix were remembered by the boys and caused such action to be afterward taken by General Van Wyck that General Dix was elected Governor of the State of New York.

Between three and four o'clock in the afternoon of November 9th, the regiment went on board a boat at Castle Garden and were taken up the East River to Hart's Island, and went ashore a little after sunset and marched to the west end of that island and turned into what was known as the "Bull Pen." It was a barrack, with a high board fence enclosing it, and was said to have been used to quarter rebel prisoners in, on their way through New York to Elmira.

The weather was very cold and the wind blew a gale all night long. There was no fuel of any kind and the boys suffered intensely, as they had no overcoats or blankets. It was the coldest experience we had during the four years of our service.

The next morning was clear and cold, but the wind had ceased about sunrise, and the matter of breakfast came up for consideration. There was no way provided for cooking and we had nothing to cook, so that made no great difference. Apparently there was no way to get anything to eat except at the sutler's shanty. General Van Wyck suggested that if we could get a ration of soft bread, that would help the sutler's goods to fill up the empty stomachs of the men.
A requisition was made, and when presented at the post commissary building by our acting comissary sergeant, he was told that they could not issue it until the boat came in from New York City with supplies. One of our number, who had had much experience in such matters, concluded that the reason for the refusal was in the interest of the adjacent sutler, so he asked General Van Wyck to let him try what he could do, and was told to go ahead.

With that permission he took the requisition, slipped around the commissary building, entered from the rear and passed through to the front, when he discovered that there was soft bread in abundance, just as he expected. The issuing clerk was very much surprised at such unusual and unexpected action, and much more astonished when told in no undecided tones that he could take his choice, to either issue the bread, or have the members of the regiment come up there and go through the shanty and help themselves.

The requisition was at once honored and filled without any further remarks or delay, and that incipient skirmish was over. The bread was loaded on carts and taken to the pen, and the boys partook of their last breakfast in the service of Uncle Sam.

The paymaster began paying shortly before noon of that day, November 10th, paying each one eight months' pay and the bounty due for the full enlistment, except those men who enlisted subsequent to July 17, 1864, who received only the bounty due for the term of their actual service. In addition to the pay and bounty, each one received a certificate of honorable discharge. It was nearly sunset when the regiment left the island on a steamboat, which landed at Jersey City too late for any but the emigrant train on the Erie road.

The men bade each other farewell, some returning to New York City, where they left on the Hudson River road; others remained over night and went home the next day. When they all reached home, many of them to never see each other again, they found, in most instances, that all the positions vacated by them on enlistment, were filled, and as there was no occupation for them they drifted away until some of them were to be found in nearly every state from Maine to California.

There were 2,176 men and boys enlisted for and assigned to the regiment from first to last. A large number deserted before we left Newburgh, and quite a number were reported as deserters afterward, during the war; some of whom were never seen or heard from, and the probability is that they were wounded and captured.
by the enemy and died in prison and no record made of them. Some undoubtedly died on the battlefield or on the skirmish line, and were never recovered or recognized.

A few left the regiment after the war had ended, while we were in the interior in the reconstruction business, as before stated. The regiment left Newburgh with 1,130 officers and men.

The original members who did not re-enlist or veteranize, were mustered out at Beaufort, S. C., or discharged there and went north for muster out and pay, during the Autumn of 1864. During the winter and spring of 1865, there were eighty recruits assigned to the regiment from drafted men and volunteers who were sent to Hart’s Island, in New York Harbor, there to await transportation to the regiment; but the war coming to a sudden ending and there being no further use for them, they were mustered out at that place in May, 1865, without having been assigned to the several companies of the regiment, and they were designated “recruits” of the regiment at large, and as not belonging to any company.

The one-year recruits, whose time expired in July and August, 1865, were mustered out at Charleston, S. C., on the 5th day of July, 1865, and the re-enlisted men and the three years’ recruits were mustered out at Hart’s Island and from the several hospitals where many of the regiment were under treatment for sickness and wounds, as the roster will show, which is compiled from the records of the Adjutant General’s office at Albany, N. Y.

The records, which are incomplete, show only the names of those who were severely wounded and sent to hospital, and do not show the names of those who were slightly wounded and who were treated in regimental hospital or in camp by the regimental surgeon.

It would appear that during active campaigns no reports were made and that after the campaign had ended and the regiment had settled down in camp for a time, that then a report was made up, mostly from memory; and after inspection, everything that was missing, was reported as “lost in action.”

If a member of the regiment was missing and could not be accounted for, he was either reported as missing, or as a deserter.

The record shows the names of 41 men killed in battle: 23 died of wounds; 170 wounded and recovered; 216 died of disease; 415 discharged for disability and wounds; 67 transferred to other commands; 5 captured and paroled.
The records are also incomplete as to the number of engagements in which the regiment participated, giving only the principal pitched battles, when in fact it was in many skirmishes in which it took an active part, and was in many engagements in which it was under fire of the enemy, while in reserve, and on several raids in which it was in the face of the enemy.

Following is a list of the engagements in which the regiment took part:

2. Lee's Mills, Va., April 28th, 1862.
3. Williamsburgh, Va., May 5th, 1862.
4. Bottoms and Turkey Island Bridge, Va., May 23rd, 1862.
5. Savage Station, Va., May 25th, 1862.
7. Seven Days' Battle, June 25th to July 2d, 1862.
8. Railroad and Bottoms Bridge, Va., June 28th and 29th, 1862.
15. Siege of Fort Wagner, S. C., July 18th, 1863.

Col. Van Wyck prided himself on knowing a good watch when he saw one and loved a stylish horse, and never failed to take notice of either when opportunity offered. One morning, in the winter of 1861-1862, while were were in Carver barracks, while strolling about the camp, as was his custom, he noticed a soldier pull out his watch and look at it seemingly with great pride and satisfaction. The Colonel was interested at once, and asked, "What have you, my boy?" "A new watch." "Let me look at it." On it's being handed him, the Colonel inspected it closely, inside and out, swearing softly and frequently. On handing it back, he asked, "Where did you buy this? How much did you give for it?" "Why, Colonel, I got it off'n two fellows here in camp; lots of the boys have bought one; there's the fellows now."

The Colonel, seeing a sergeant coming out of Company D street, said: "Sergeant! sergeant, come here at once." He did so and saluted. The Colonel ordered, "have those two rascals arrested and taken into your company's headquarters, then send around to every company and bring all the boys who have bought watches of them to Capt. Wheeler's room."

A corporal was sent to convey the Colonel's orders to the officer of the day, who soon had the two peddlers in a room in the barracks. Word soon got around that something unusual was going on in Company D barracks, and a large crowd soon gathered. All who had invested in watches were sifted out, and as many as the room would hold, were taken into the Captain's quarters, where Colonel Van Wyck and some other officers had also gone; the other watch-holders were ordered to remain in the street and await developments.
The Colonel having constituted himself a Court of Law and Equity, as sole arbiter, proceeded to business. and said, "Here, my man, did you buy a watch of those men?" "Yes sir," "Show it to me." It was shown and pronounced not worth a d—n. "How much did you pay for it?" "Fourteen dollars." Then to the peddlers, "Here, take this thing and give the man his money back." It was done in short order and the soldier was passed out. "Next man." The same question and answer, except as to price, which was "nineteen dollars." "No! no! no! he never paid for it; not but twelve tollar." "Yes, I did; didn't I Bill?" A chorus of yes'es from the others. The Colonel said, "Give him his nineteen dollars." About this time the boys "caught on," and the price of watches suddenly advanced; any number were ready to confirm each other's statements.

The sharpers wept, lamented and entreated, and tried to get away, but it was no use; watch after watch was produced and redeemed at ruinous rates. A shrewd young man produced an old veteran of a ticker whose bangs and bruises showed unmistakable evidence of years of use, and swore that he bought it "off'n the little rascal there," at the same time keeping it out of sight of the Colonel, who, in the face of violent protests of the little peddler, ordered it redeemed, which was done at about the "usual price." And so it went, until all who had bought watches, and were tired of their bargain, and eight or ten with old watches besides, had "given up" and received their money. The crestfallen peddlers were escorted to post No. 1 and allowed to go, which they speedily did, wailing and cursing. "Dem tam Colonel, he make us redeem more as twelf huntered tollar as we sold already, unt pay for dem oder twelf old ones dat we never haf seen, aint it? Och Gott, vot we shall done, I didn't know."

After the crowd had disappeared and Captain Wheeler's room was cleared of all except Col. Van Wyck and three or four others, Old Jim Jones, the Captain's cook, took from the table an old coat of his. He wore a broad grin as he said, "Colonel, can't I sell you a good, new watch?" "How! why! where!" "Oh, I've got a few those fellows didn't seem to want." Under the coat were seven or eight new watches which the poor peddlers had placed on the table, and over which, with great presence of mind, old Jim had thrown his coat. The old rascal thereafter had weekly raffles on them all winter.

Some Chatham Street pullers had captured a lot of the 56th boys in New York on their final muster-out, and were on hand at the pay-table to collect their money.
The clothing was shoddy, pure and simple, but the prices were not. Colonel Van Wyck told the paymaster not to withhold a cent without the consent of the soldier, and he told the boys that they had been, as any one could see, outrageously cheated. To the dealers, he said, "You can collect this money through the courts, if you like. You can't interfere here." Then the clothing men wept and tore their hair, cursed and swore, and the "old man," said to a bystander, "Those fellows began trading in second-hand clothing at the foot of the cross and have kept it up ever since."

Colonel Van Wyck, or the "old man," as he was familiarly called, was not much of a sport; knew very little of gambling or sporting games or usages, and seemed to consider himself as a guardian of the persons and property of the boys under his command, and acted as though he felt himself responsible for their conduct and morals, which he faithfully looked after, and to the best of his ability, guarded them against temptation and prevented them from falling into evil ways, and some of the boys took advantage of his ignorance and goodness in order to get a joke on him.

One day while we were in camp at Beaufort, S. C., some wag of an officer went into the Colonel's tent and told him that one of the 56th men was at work down town in a saloon. "In a saloon? It's a d—d infernal outrage. I'll write to General Saxton and have him returned to his company at once. Taking pen and paper he wrote to Brig. General Saxton, "Please return to his regiment Private Jones of Company R. I understand he is at the 'Magnolia,' setting up ten pins on a billiard table."

One morning, on Morris Island, the chaplain went into Captain C's tent and complained of not feeling at all well; had a head ache and a bad taste in his mouth. The captain's cook, who was an old English soldier, after hearing the chaplain's reply, said, "Dominie, hexcuse me, Chaplain, but when I was an hossifer's servant in the Crimea, they used to 'ave the same symptoms; but, sir, haskin your pardon for the liberty of hinterferin', hif you will take a seidlitz powder in the morning hafter bein' drunk hover night, youse find yourself bright as a new shillin'."

The officers of Companys D and E had just finished their breakfast one morning at the headquarters of the brickyard picket, on Port Royal Island, S. C., and were loading their pipes, when one of the queerest looking darkies that can be imagined, appeared at the door and inquired for the "head captain." Captain Cox was pointed out as such, and the little old fellow, every section of whom seemed a misfit, made a low obeisance and asked if he would do him a favor. The captain told him he would gladly do so if he would state his wants. "Well, sah, would you do me de favoh of readin' to me bout dat prodigal boy what de Bible tol about?" The captain did so, and was asked to read it again, which was done. The darkey then had it word perfect he said and intimated that he had a boy of that description. Then he said, "'Scuse me, sah, but you bin so kine, would you please write me a letter to my ole woman at Hilton Head?" The captain said, "Certainly I will," and on producing paper and all being in readiness, said, "now go ahead and tell me what to write." "Well, now, Cap'n, sir, you better write it yoursef, yous married I guess and will know what to say." "No, no; you must tell me what you want to say to her." He dictated the usual,
"I now take my pen in hand to let you know that I am not so well, tank the Lord, and hope these few lines will find you enjoying the same blessing," and after a few more sentences reached his limit and stopped. The captain asked, "Well, Uncle, what else?" "Well, sah, I guess dat's about all, less you put in ' please 'scuse bad writin'
and spelling'."

Several of the officers of the regiment were at Chester making the final muster-out rolls, and five of them, on starting for Charleston, hired an ex-Johnny to take them by wagon to the nearest railroad station. It was a long, hot and dusty drive, and about two p. m. they reached a large grove of pines, in the midst of which were some twenty or more negro houses, evidently the quarters of some large plantation. On stopping, a large crowd of colored people, mostly women and children, gathered around the wagon. One particularly large, fat, greasy negress, with her great fat neck and bosom all bare and glistening with perspiration, seemed to be the leading spirit of the party. She held in her arms a little stark naked pickaninnny. The driver said to her, "Aunty, where is the bucket;
I want to give my horses a drink." "No, sah; no, sah. I don't got no bucket foh you. You say de las time you goin fru here you gwine show me Gin'l Sherman. Now whah de gineral? You don't haf him, so you don't git no bucket." "Oh, that's all right," says the driver, “the general is right here this time; there he is on the front seat next to you.” The old lady sprang to the front seat, and trembling with excitement, exclaimed, “Which is he, which is de gin’l? I wan’sheum quick.” The driver pointed to Captain ——, and said, “He is your man, auntie.” “Is you de man? Is you Gin’l Sherman?” The captain answered, “Yes, I’m General Sherman.” “Oh, tank God: tank de good Lord,” and she jumped up on the hub of the wheel and throwing her arms around the captain’s neck, pulled his face toward her, and with many “tank Gods, you is Gin’l Sherman what come down here to set us all free,” she kissed the poor, overwhelmed captain all over his face and ears, in spite of all his struggles and cuss words. She finally desisted, and the driver got the bucket, and the captain was not allowed to forget the time he impersonated Gen’l Sherman, and it was a sore subject to him ever thereafter.

In the month of February, 1862, when the regiment was with the brigade in Carver barracks, the weather was very unpleasant, dark and stormy, and the mud all around was deep and the ordinary roads were nearly impassable. The parade ground was for a time unfit for use. One Sabbath morning, after a couple of days’ of sunshine, the great plaza around which the barracks of the brigade had been built, had become measurably dry, except here and there a mud hole, the regiment was ordered to assemble at the music stand for the usual Sabbath morning service.

Colonel Van Wyck had just returned from New York State, and called at the quarters of the non-commissioned staff for his military suit, where he had left it for convenient keeping. Donning the uniform and accompanied by the Quartermaster-Sergeant and Commissary Sergeant Roosa, he went out to the music stand, around which were assembled a large number of our legion and members of neighboring regiments.

Chaplain Shelling, after delivering a stirring sermon, gave way to the Colonel, who took the stand and gave the “boys” good advice and solemn admonition. We were daily expecting an order for the “on to Richmond move,” when camp would be broken and we would enter upon the rigors and dangers of the march, bivouac and battle, and the Colonel dilated on what was soon to come; said probably very soon many who were present would be summoned to meet their Maker. He spoke of the sin of profanity, its uselessness, its offensiveness, its wickedness, and said he had pledged himself to quit it forever, and adjured all who heard him to do likewise.

The meeting closed, and taking the arm of Isaac Roosa, the Commissary Sergeant, the Colonel walked rapidly toward post No. 1, engaged in earnest conversation. Not heeding his steps, he plunged into one of the mud holes, ankle deep, and forgetting his pledge and admonition, uttered certain words very emphatically, which sounded very much like swearing. He condemned the mud hole to a place which, in medieval theology, was supposed to be hot enough to transform mud holes into very thin vapor in the twinkling of an eye. Force of habit, near-sightedness, absent-mindedness, pre-occupiedness and a little recklessness mixed in, afforded ample excuse for the awful break.

After the Peninsular campaign, with its defeats and victories and baffled purposes, had ended, Naglee’s brigade was ordered to Yorktown, Va., for post duty, soon to be relieved, as was declared, by new troops. But the order never came, as was probably originally contemplated, and our regiment was then and there separated from the Army of the Potomac, and therefore escaped the horrors of second Bull Run, Frederickburgh and Chancellorsville.

The regiment had been in camp a few days, and the camp arrangements, for several causes, were as yet quite incomplete. An express box for Major Sharp was daily expected. This officer had been discharged a very short time before, and had gone, leaving word with the surgeon to receive it when it came and utilize its contents, solids and liquids, in the entertainment of certain comrades.

The eagerly looked for box duly arrived. The afternoon and early evening had been dark and stormy, with thunder, lightning and rain. The notified comrades punctually gathered at the surgeon’s tent. Partaking of the viands, especially the fluids, caused much exhilaration, enthusiasm and fluent speech. The Quartermaster, having a propensity for speech making, in the exuberance of the occasion, mounted a cracker box and exploited the gallant deeds of Naglee’s brigade during the Peninsular campaign. He spoke of battles and skirmishes in which it had participated: its wading waist deep in the waters of the Chickahominy; of its great service and mighty peril in covering the movements of McClellan’s army at White Oak Swamp and from Malvern Hill to Harrison’s Landing.

There was much loud applause. The Colonel heard the noise and ordered it to cease. The enthusiasm was too intense for instant obedience. Order for the arrest of the whole party followed.

The orator was taken to his quarters by a guard, and muttered as he walked, looking at the bright, silvery moon, which, through a rift in the subsiding storm-clouds, was shining brilliantly, "that things had come to a pretty pass, that it should be considered an offense to make a patriotic speech, even in a Union camp by a boy in blue."

The speech was merely suspended—not extinguished. Its delivery was resumed by the request of the Colonel himself more than two years thereafter, and concluded, with much applause, at the lower end of Morris Island, S. C., at a supper given by Lieut. Fowler, U. S. Commissary at that post.

In the early part of July, 1863, our regiment was sent, with other troops, to James Island, and made a demonstration, threatening an attack on the City of Charleston by way of Secessionville. This feint by General Stephenson's brigade, of which we formed a part, had the desired effect, as it drew some 5,000 rebel troops from Morris Island to confront us. They came upon us unexpectedly in the night and drove in, in confusion, the 54th Massachusetts colored troops, who were on picket. Then there were mustering in hot haste and rallying to sustain the colored regiment. The providential arrival of Rockwell's Connecticut light battery and a gunboat or two saved the troops from capture.

At the first explosion of shells, our Chaplain, the Colonel's brother, an earnest, Christian man, and good preacher, quite properly inquired of his brother, "Charles, where shall I go?" The Colonel, at the first inquiry, paid no attention, but when the Chaplain seized him by the leg and again made the same inquiry, the Colonel, quite forgetting his charge to the boys about cursing and swearing at Carver's Barracks on that Sunday morning, answered, "You can go to — if you want to," mentioning the place to which he consigned the offending mud hole. The Chaplain, however, did no such thing; he mounted the well-known horse "Barney" and went toward the landing.

The regiment was in camp at Beaufort, S. C., recruiting and recovering from the awful experience on Seabrook Island in the summer of 1863—that place full of doleful creatures, stagnant swamps, luxurious vegetation, the home of fevers and tropical pestilence, where the men contracted fevers and became impregnated with germs of malignant disease, which began to develop, from which diseases many died and very many were dangerously sick, both in camp and hospital.

Colonel Van Wyck was among those who suffered severely from malarial fever, or chills and fever. The attacks came on periodically. During one of the more than usually severe spells, he was prostrated to the ground and cried out, "Quick! Go to George," meaning the very popular, skillful and good-hearted hospital steward, "and tell him to send me some medicine right away—tell him how bad I am."

This message was duly communicated to the steward. It so happened that a few days before, the Colonel, for some quite trifling offense, had put him under arrest and had not released him. The messenger said to George, "The Colonel is very bad, and unless he has the medicine right away, he may die."

The hospital steward replied, "I can't help it. Let him die and be d—d. I am under arrest; that stops all business. Tell him if he releases me he can have the medicine."

The Colonel being informed of existing conditions immediately ordered the release of the steward, and thereupon got his medicine, which gave him speedy relief. George frequently related how he got ahead of the Colonel.

The white aristocratic residents of several of the sea islands on the coast of South Carolina, including the City of Beaufort, the Newport of the south, abandoned their plantations and mansions, and resident negroes, with many from the mainland, took possession of many of them.

Humanitarian societies in the north, especially in Massachusetts, the Freedman's Society among them, by agents, teachers and several preachers, made well directed efforts to bring the ignorant, swarming masses to civilization, education and Christianity. This enterprise was at length placed under the guidance and protection of the War Department. Many refined and educated ladies, and several male teachers and preachers, left northern homes and upon these islands labored in the above capacity.

General Rufus Saxton, civil and military governor of South Carolina, was nominally, at least, at the head of it, and great good was done. These teachers were often called Gideonites. Colonel Van Wyck took deep interest in this benign work. He made many addresses to gatherings of the colored people, with much success.

One Sabbath morning in the spring of 1864, he was to address a gathering of colored people at the Central Baptist Church on St. Helena Island. At the church many of the fugitive nobility of the island, in ante bellum days, were accustomed to worship. It was utilized as a place for a day school for colored children and for sacred worship on Sunday. He was accompanied by his mother, his aunt, Mrs. DuBois, Chaplain Geo. P. Van Wyck, Capt. James DuBois, and Quartermaster Shafer. They went by rowboat, manned by two lusty freedmen, who sang occasionally as it glided along, strange, sweet and solemn melodies.

The church was shaded by lofty live oaks with pendulous moss hanging from their spreading branches. It overflowed with colored people, from the little child to the hoary head. The women wore dark frocks with white aprons. Some with bright colored headkerchiefs and some with straw hats with gay feathers.

It was a picturesque assemblage. There were several lady teachers present, all white, except one of olive complexion, an octofoon, a graceful, cultured lady from the north, with fine education and great gifts as an authoress. The people sang in rich, sweet tones, great rolling waves of sound, "Roll, Jordan, Roll," "Go Down in the Lonesome Valley," etc.

The Colonel appeared in his brightest uniform, but his effort was not a success. He halted and rambled through a long address. This was to his comrades at first inexplicable. It so happened that one of the teachers, bright and pretty, with glittering eyes, sat directly in front of him and looked up in his face with inquisitive gaze. The effect was quite curious. He was under a sort of charm or spell. He afterwards said, "That devilish witch-eyed Gideonitess who sat in the seat before me looked right up in my face a steady and most disconcerting gaze. It nearly broke we down several times."

This unpleasant experience, perhaps never occurred before or afterward, in all the long and varied career of the gifted Colonel. He continued his labor of love whenever opportunity offered. The Chaplain, also, earnestly labored in the vineyard. He united in wedlock a number who in cruel slavery days had lived in concubinage.
The Colonel, while in camp at a certain place, in some unaccountable manner, became the proud possessor of a good, fat goose, which he directed his cook to prepare for dinner. He invited a few of his favorite officers to partake of his hospitality, and made great preparations to entertain them in grand style. The fact became known by some unknown means and some of the mischievous boys, perhaps some of the officers were the real instigators, undertook to disarrange and disrupt the program, at least so far as the goose was concerned. They set out to kidnap that part of the entertainment, which was next to impossible, as the cook was very alert and suspicious, keeping close to the fire over which was hung the camp kettle, with the goose inside and a cover on.

The problem that presented itself was to get the cook away from the fire for a few moments. Quite a number of the boys were gathered around the fire, inhaling the fragrant odors and trying to distract the cook's attention, but to no purpose: he was onto them. But where there is a will there is a way. The boys knew that, and as they were absolutely certain they had the will all right, they felt as though the way must be found. Finally one bright and ingenious lad hatched an idea and proceeded to put it in force. He slipped around quietly from one to another of the boys around the fire and whispered to each one and then walked away, passing in front of the Colonel's tent on his way to his quarters, and when out of sight of the cook, he approached the sentinel, who was doing duty in front of the Colonel's tent, and held a short, whispered consultation with him, then went on his way. Soon after, the sentinel, when he reached the end of his beat nearest the cook fire, stepped out a little farther so he could see the cook, and in a low voice, not loud enough for the Colonel to hear, but sufficiently loud for the cook to hear, as all was as quiet as the grave around the fire, in accordance to previous instructions, said, "Fred, the Colonel wants you." The cook was completely taken off his guard; at once turned around and started to go around to the front of the tent, but had taken but a few steps, barely turned the corner, when it suddenly flashed upon his mind that it was a false alarm—that it was only a ruse to get him away from the fire. He turned and retraced his steps in hot haste, reached the fire, removed the lid, only to discover that the goose was gone. It was never heard from. It vanished as surely, swiftly and effectually as though it had evaporated into thin air. Nobody knew who took it: nobody knew what became of it, and consequently the goose dinner was enjoyed by the Colonel and his officers only in anticipation.

On the occasion of the raid to Gloucester, when the brigade, in command of General Naglee, reached the city about sundown, the 56th Regiment was ordered into a large, open field in the suburbs, with orders to the boys to make themselves as comfortable as possible for the night. Guns were stacked, guards posted around the bivouac, pup tents put up, a cold lunch partaken of, as orders had been given to light no fires, and the boys were just disposing themselves for the night, when one of the General's orderlies came and delivered orders for the regiment to march into the city in full marching order, with knapsacks packed and all equipments. The regiment was ordered to form left in front, with the two right companies south of the court house square, on the main street and opposite side of the General's headquarters, which was on the corner of the main street and the street running along the south side of the square. The balance of the regiment to be opposite the square. When the regiment was halted, orders were given to stack the guns and put a guard over the colors and for the men, with their knapsacks and equipments on, and to be kept on, to stay on the sidewalk in place. They were allowed, however, to sit down and rest on their knapsacks, or to sit close to the houses and rest against them, but to remain in place, ready at a moment's notice to fall in and take arms, for any move that the regiment might be called on to make during the night, in case of an attack by the enemy.

It was quite dark when the men were in place on the sidewalk, sitting and lying and resting; but they did not remain very long. As though by a preconcerted arrangement, nearly every one of the regiment quietly slipped off his knapsack and as quietly slipped away in the darkness. But a few of each company were left to care for the knapsacks and things left. The boys seemed to have an idea that General Naglee had ordered the regiment into the city for purposes of investigation; at any rate, a thorough investigation was instituted. One of the boys went down the street on the south side of the square and when just past the rear of the General's headquarters, about opposite the yard between the house and carriage house, where the General's body guard were stationed, the boy heard ducks quacking, and was about to proceed to investigate the cause, when he heard General Naglee, from the back porch, call out to the calvarymen, directing them to catch a half dozen of those ducks and put them in the south front room of the mansion for safe keeping, as he wanted them for breakfast for himself and staff; and that if they were not safely secured under guard, Charley Van Wyck's chicken thieves would have them all before morning. The ducks were caught and placed in the room designated, which was next to the front porch, on which a guard was posted, who walked back and forth in front of the window which opened out on the porch. There was an alley leading from the street on the south side of the house to the stable, and a window of the room in which the ducks were placed on the side overlooking the alley. The bottom of the window, however, was some eight feet from the ground, owing to the steep grade of the alley. All this was observed by the boy, who being nettled at the General's remark about chicken thieves, determined to make good the reputation of the regiment as given by the General, and to teach him to take a joke.

The young man, after sizing up the situation, started out to find some suitable and competent assistants. After an hour or so he found the certain boy of Company B he was in search of, and confided to him the situation and the problem, which, after a time, they worked out. They secured the services of two tall, stout men, and all stole silently, one by one, into the alley, under the window. One of the boys climbed onto the shoulders of the big man and silently raised the window and climbed into the room, followed by the second young man, and in an incredibly short time they had those ducks securely tied onto a cord and lowered to the men on the ground, followed by the boys, and the ducks never made a quack, or flap of the wing. It was done so quietly and noiselessly that the sentry on the porch did not see or hear anything, and when the ducks were called for in the morning, to furnish meat for the General and staff, they were not to be found. The General was forced to console himself with the knowledge that for once he had proved himself a true prophet. What the other boys did that night has never been fully told. We all had fowls for breakfast, some had honey and other good things, but nothing very had been done, as nobody found any fault, not even the General himself, nor any of the citizens, nor the postmaster, on account of the boys overhauling the mail for him.
